The Index.

Three Dollars a Year. LIBERTY AND LIGHT. Single Copies Seven Cents.

VOLUME 5. BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, JANUARY 1, 1874. WHOLE NO. 210.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor

BOSTON, Sept. 1, 1873.

For List of Liberal Leagues, see next page.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York, will occupy the pulpit of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, at "The Parker Memorial," next Sunday morning, at half-past ten o'clock.

CHARLES SUMNER says he took his "first holiday during a protracted public service" in attending the annual dinner of the New England Society, on the 22d of December last, in New York. He made a noble speech on that occasion.

THE MEETING of the Second Radical Club, on Monday evening, Dec. 22, was one of the most interesting and successful it has ever held. The "Abolition of the State" proved to be a theme most fruitful of ideas and of a happy and delightful conversation.

THE LAST publication day of THE INDEX was on Christmas, and this week it celebrates New Year's day by the same happy coincidence. May prosperity and peace attend it and all its readers through the year eighteen hundred and seventy-four!

CERTAIN GOOD FOLK are just now exercised over the question whether Prof. Agassiz had any religion, and if so, what sort of thing it was. It is a pity that it could not somehow be respectfully hinted to these people that they are meddling with what is none of their business.

THE International Review is a new periodical, its first number being published this month, which says that it is determined to admit to its pages "no assault upon the divine authority of the Scriptures." This carefulness of certain men to preserve what is "divine," would seem to argue a secret infidelity in their own hearts as to the real divinity of the "divine."

THE FAMOUS "week of prayer" of the American Evangelical Alliance begins next Sunday, and the programme of prayer-subjects, which has been prepared, is apparently extensive enough to keep the brethren busily praying through every day of the week. Well, each one to his chosen task. Let those pray who will; and those who will not, let them omit prayer. The world is helped by every earnest word, whether spoken to man or God.

THE BOSTON School Committee are just now exercised upon the subject of corporal punishment of pupils. They can't quite make up their minds to abolish the rule allowing it, and yet they do not seem fully satisfied to let the rule stand. The old stereotyped fear that human nature will go to the bad if we cease to compel it to go to the good, seems to prevail in this case, and make the Committee hesitate to sweep away the relic of barbarism which would pound instead of expound.

THE Christian Union refers to the criticism of John Weiss on the late Evangelical Alliance, that it "gave its time to the discussion of theological questions, with scarcely a moment to social evils," and retorts by asking why the Free Religious Association, whose convention immediately succeeded that of the Alliance, did the same thing? We consider this the retort civil, and we confess that the point seems to us to be well made. If it requires courage to strike a blow, it also requires candor to acknowledge when we are fairly hit.

IT GIVES us sincere pleasure to learn that the radical Unitarian Society in West Newton, in this State, have recalled the Rev. Francis Tiffany to be their minister. Mr. Tiffany, some three or four years since, left this society, on account of ill health, and went to Germany with his family. His health is fortunately restored, and he has returned to this country. We trust that he will decide to renew his relations with his former society, and give them and his many friends in this vicinity once more the benefit and pleasure of his able ministrations and scholarly and social companionship.

A MERCANTILE friend of ours tells us that a customer of his thus criticised, the other day, one of our national mottoes: "You see they've got it on the five-cent pieces, 'In God we trust.' Now think of a great nation like ours putting a lie on its currency! If they had said, 'The god we trust,' they'd have hit it. It's the only God nine out of ten of 'em know." We suppose that the rough customer may be right; but if a man or a nation trusts in, and is devoted to, the Best they know, what more ought we to expect? The trouble is, that so many men and nations are not faithful to their highest ideal, be that what it may.

THE SERMON of Rev. Dr. Peabody on the late Prof. Agassiz, delivered in Appleton Chapel, Cambridge, Dec. 21, 1873, is in the main an eloquent and just tribute to the character and services of the eminent deceased. Yet one sentence occurs in this discourse, which we are sure does great injustice to Mr. Agassiz both as a man and a scientific scholar. "His repugnance to Darwinism," says Dr. Peabody, "grew in great part from his apprehensions of its atheistical tendency." If this were true, Prof. Agassiz was no true man of science. But we do not believe it was true. So far as we know, Prof. Agassiz never urged any but purely scientific grounds against Darwinism; and to say now, when he is dead and cannot defend himself from the damaging aspersion, that he was opposed to it on theological grounds, is to impeach his truly scientific character, and to becloud his well-earned scientific renown.

THE RECENT settlement by this nation of the "Virginius" difficulty with Spain, without bloodshed and by friendly negotiation, is an event full of peaceful suggestions for the future. And, after all, it seems we should not have been justified in going to war with the Spanish republic, though we spent five millions in getting ready for such an issue; for the Attorney General has discovered that the "Virginius" had no right to be sailing under the American flag. But why should we have thought of war at all? It would not have brought back to us the lives of the men executed by the Spanish authorities in Cuba, while it probably would have been waged at the sacrifice of many more. A peaceful termination of an international difficulty is almost always possible, and a contest of arms should never be proposed except as the very last resort. The age of peace has come; let us believe in the fact, and vote war a relic of barbarism inconsistent with the civilization which we are determined now shall prevail!

THE CITY SOLICITOR of Boston, in a reply to an inquiry of the School Board whether women may legally be members of the School Committee, has replied that in his opinion "women cannot legally be elected to or perform the duties of that office." To support this judgment, the Solicitor cites the somewhat recent decision of the Supreme Court of this State, "that women cannot be appointed to or exercise the duties of Justices of the Peace," and says that the reasons assigned in the one case are equally applicable in the other. If this opinion of the Solicitor prevails, the capable women just elected to be members of the Boston School Committee, by an almost unanimous vote, will not be allowed to enter upon their office. It is astonishing what an amount of legal stolidity sometimes consists with legal learning! Counsellors and jurists should interpret a law according to its most liberal spirit, not according to its most stringent letter. But what business, forsooth, has any mere statute law to stand in the way of human progress? "Law" may be a fetich as well as anything else; it always lags behind the spirit of the age, and has to be pricked up or passed by.

Church and State.

A LECTURE BEFORE THE MUSIC HALL SOCIETY, IN BOSTON, OCT. 5, 1873.

BY FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

The topic on which I am to speak to you this morning—"Church and State"—has been selected because I consider it one of the most important questions of the times, if not in reality the most important of them all. You will not expect from me any fine and impressive outbursts of eloquence, any gorgeous word-painting, any flights of imagination, any persuasive or pathetic appeals to your sensibilities, or anything whatever the object of which shall be to delight you with rhetorical displays, or amuse you with the coruscations of a brilliant wit. These things I lack; and what I say will be said because I have strong and deep convictions to utter, which, however they may differ from the common opinion, and very likely also from your own opinion, you will be quite willing to hear patiently and judge candidly. At some inconvenience to myself, I have consented this morning to address you, chiefly because I believe it is time that these convictions should find public utterance, and in Boston. On this free platform, immortalized by one whose name and fame will be forever associated with it, I would speak to you as one who has something to say, and who believes that the simple and direct language of earnest conviction will always, at least in this Hall, find an attentive and hospitable hearing. While, therefore, in the neighboring city of New York, distinguished delegates have assembled from almost every part of Christendom to deliberate on the state, the prospects, and the wants of the Christian Church, and to devise ways and means of carrying Protestant Christianity to the very ends of the earth, I ask leave to give you some of my reasons for believing that the Christian Church is a most dangerous enemy within the very citadel of American institutions, and that every enlightened patriot and every wise friend of humanity must desire for it a natural but speedy death; in other words, that the Christian Church and the American Republic cannot permanently coëxist, but that one of the two must ultimately build its own safety on the total ruin of the other. Between the two there exists an irrepressible conflict, as absolute and irreconcilable as that between the former slave system of the South and the free industrial system of the North. However long delayed, the final outbreak of this conflict is only a question of time; the seeds of it are here to-day in two systems of principles leading to contradictory policies of action, and sooner or later, in one way or in another, the now latent antagonism must declare itself openly in our political life.

Let me most earnestly disclaim any wish to make sensational statements or to stir up hostile passions for any reason whatever: I speak seriously, soberly, deliberately, as befits one who would benefit and not injure his fellow-men. But there seems to exist in the community at large a strange reluctance or inability to see the true bearing and significance of tendencies which are actively at work all about us, and continually reveal themselves in events not difficult to be understood by him who follows the clew of ideas. Here in the Western world, where society and government are based wholly on faith in human freedom, and where all our institutions are more and more assimilating themselves to it, there exists the phenomenon of a great and popular religion, with powerful and wealthy institutions all based on the opposite principle of faith in supernatural authority, which is despair of human freedom. How is it possible that a difference so vast and grave should not by-and-by force a public recognition of itself which might be indefinitely postponed in countries not purely republican in their character? "Extremes meet." Where liberty is the most thoroughly established, there the reaction against it will inevitably assume the most thorough-going shape. It is precisely because America is so completely democratic in spirit and institutions, that a monarchical religion will ultimately find it impossible to make its own existence in America secure without attempting the very life of a political system which threatens it continually, and undermines the foundations of its authority in every mind by the subtile influences of daily contact. Christianity must either die out without a struggle, or it must make its struggles vigorous indeed. The whole tendencies of American life are against Christian doctrines; but the Christian Church must rest on Christian doctrines, as it very well knows. When driven to extremities by the continuance of the slow undermining forces I have referred to, what student of history, at least, can doubt that the Church will make one more bid for life by turning upon the political system by which they are generated? But I must show more in detail what is the nature of the antagonism I mention between the Church and the Republic.

What is the Christian Church?

Waiving all the common distinctions between the Church visible and invisible, and so forth, I should define it in a very common-sense way, as the organized body, or bodies, of all those who profess to be followers of Christ. That is, I consider it solely in the light of an INSTITUTION, established for the practice, support, and propagation of the Christian religion. Although no longer existing in its pristine unity, but on the contrary being now divided into three great branches, Roman, Greek, and Protestant, of which the last is subdivided into a great number of sects more or less discordant among themselves, the Christian Church properly includes all who profess and actively support what they themselves believe to be the Christian religion. Outsiders disregard their mutual jealousies and disputes; the Church as a whole must include all who are organized for the purpose of maintaining and spreading Christianity as they themselves understand it. This is the historic meaning of the word; it is also the rational meaning of it. What the various divisions and subdivisions of the Church have thought or are thinking, have done or are doing, constitutes Christian history, or the history of the Christian Church; and the only historical and rational definition of Christianity itself must be gathered from this history. Individuals, of course, may philosophize or dogmatize as they please about Christianity, its doctrines, or its definition; but history considers only what organized bodies of Christians have said or done, regards their collective utterances or actions as alone authoritative, and accepts them as the only genuine words and deeds of the Christian Church. Viewed in this manner, as a great established institution, with a definite historical beginning and career, the Church has held definite relations to other institutions, especially political ones; and only in this sense is it proper to speak of "Church and State." In all other aspects, Christianity is a matter of personal experience or personal biography; which history entirely ignores except so far as it relates itself to the existence or activity of Christian institutions.

The Church, therefore, is to be regarded as an institution holding definite relations to other institutions. So considered, it has its own fundamental or essential ideas, which it was founded to express and which have given to it its peculiar political, social, and religious character. What are they?

If the sacred writings and traditions of the Church itself are the proper exponent of them, as I believe they are, it is by no means difficult to discover them. For this purpose there is no need to go into the perplexing inquiries as to date, authorship, or authenticity of the Scriptures which are held sacred, or of the traditions which are accepted as authority, by the Church. It is enough that such Scriptures and traditions have been accepted by it; for it has derived its ideas from these sources, and no others. Whether the ideas of the Church are true or not, is one question; whether they are its ideas, is a wholly different one. Hence I think it unnecessary to go outside of the Church's own account of the matter, to find out what ideas it really stands for. If history only confirms the statements of the Church, and shows that the ideas it professes to accept are the ideas it has always proclaimed and always made the basis of its collective action, then I hold, as I think others will hold, that the leading principles, ideas, or doctrines of Christianity are easily ascertainable,—so far, at least, as the institutional interpretation of the Church is concerned. To the commonly accepted sources, therefore, I turn, in forming my conclusions as to the fundamental ideas which have been organized historically in the Christian Church.

One great fact, then, strikes us at first glance, namely, that all the narratives of the Christian Gospels converge to one point, in showing that Jesus is the true Christ of God. Ancient prophecies are quoted at every step to prove that the events of his life establish his claim to be accepted as the Christ,—that is, the Divinely sent and Divinely appointed SOVEREIGN in the so-called "kingdom of God." Under God, Jesus is proclaimed, from beginning to end of the New Testament, as the Savior, the Redeemer, the Master, the Lord, the King, of the entire world. He makes the claim himself; it is witnessed by John the Baptist, and by Peter, and by cast-out demons; it is attested by the miracles; it is the point and explicit teaching of almost all the parables; it is the ground of his accusation before Herod and Pilate; it is the cause of the crucifixion. In a word, this claim to be the Christ is the very soul of the four Gospels, which were written to prove it true. None the less is it the burden of the Acts, the Epistles, the Apocalypse. The one confession demanded by the apostles from all their converts was that of faith in Jesus as the Christ. "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ," they said—that is, believe that Jesus is the Lord and Christ,—"and thou shalt be saved." On this, the distinctive Christian confession—as distinctive as the Mohammedan confession that Mohammed is God's prophet—was the Christian Church founded as an institution; and to this confession has every great branch of the Church, every great sect of the Protestant branch, and even every little sect that is looked upon as most deeply sunk in heresy, been invariably true. It seems nothing less than fatuity to doubt that the corner-stone of historical Christianity is faith in Jesus as Lord and King of mankind, with Divinely bestowed authority over all the individuals and nations of the earth. Certainly, this faith has been, and still is, the very breath of life to all parts of the Christian Church. The moral precepts and teachings he gave have derived all their authority with the Church from the Divine appointment he received to be the Law-giver and Ruler of the world. Outsiders approve or disapprove them according to their intrinsic merit; but every Christian reverently accepts them as the direct revelation of Heaven. Even Dr. Channing, the greatest exponent of Unitarianism, with all his heresies, declared explicity: "The voice of Jesus is the voice of God."

Now this one prime article of the Christian creed, which underlies and supports all its other articles, has been the law and dominant idea of the Church in all ages. It soon grew into the dogma that Jesus was very God of very God, the second person of the Trinity. In the person of Constantine, miscalled the Great, it mounted the throne of the Roman empire, and conquered the Roman States. In the person of the Popes, it survived the fall of the Roman empire and governed princes, kings, and emperors during the long political supremacy of the Church in the Middle Ages. It was questioned by nobody. Luther and Calvin, and all the leaders of the Protestant Reformation, maintained it as stoutly as the most devoted Catholic. To this day it is the essential doctrine of all divisions and subdivisions of the Church. It allied itself with the State, controlling legislation and dictating national policies, in every country of the Old World; and it governed the early colonies of the New World as absolutely as it governed the Old. Wherever it went, it upheld monarchy as the Divinely appointed system of government; it crowned all monarchs as "Kings by the grace of God;" it sanctioned the "powers that be" in every land as ordained by God; it everywhere frowned upon the impious pretensions of the people to govern themselves. It brought Christianity everywhere and always into alliance with monarchical claims, made it sympathize with royalty as by an unerring instinct, and compelled liberty-lovers in Europe to see one single foe in the royal State and the royal Church. Only in America has it failed to grasp the reins of political power. Thanks to the great free-thinkers of the Revolution, this essential dogma of Christianity was thrust into the background, and America was baptized in the name of the people, not of the Christ. For the first time in human history, a great nation was born to be its own Christ, and to know no subjection to the King of all Christendom. The Church was dethroned, and, at least by the theory of the national government and Constitution, it is not even known to exist. The Great Republic could not stultify itself by confessing fealty to any King, even to a King whose dominion was invisible in the conscience and the heart. Secular it was and is; secular it must remain, or its doom is sealed. Its law is the law of natural justice between man and man, equality of human rights, sanctity of freedom as the birthright of every human being. Because here the idea of "government of the people, by the people, for the people," was made the organic law of the land, the Christ-claim of the Church became an anachronism and absurdity; royalty was an idea that could by no possibility be admitted under any form; and the Christian Church, which is royalty carried out to the farthest possible extent, abides here in America as an institution imported from the Old World, and fundamentally out of harmony with the government that protects it. Its ideas are no longer omnipotent, powerful as they still are. The Evangelical Alliance is now busily at work, trying to cement together the fragments broken off from the ancient Church at the Reformation and to construct a living whole out of decaying elements. It is an attempt to foster and strengthen here a system of spiritual government which gives the lie direct to every principle of republicanism. The poor patchwork it undertakes is a failure from the start; for it leaves out of its scheme the great Church of Rome, the most vital in Christendom. Rome knows well its own antagonism to republicanism, however adroitly her priests dissemble here, and in the Syllabus of Pius IX. denounces it. But Protestantism, affirming republicanism in secular things and royalty in spiritual things, must go to the wall. The Church is awaking to her danger in America; and she will either commit suicide by trying to republicanize her own religion (an impossibility), or she will try desperately to adapt the Republic to herself by usurping control of it.

This, then, is the profound and irreconcilable antagonism between the Church and the Republic. The whole faith and life of the Church is based on the monarchical theory of absolute submission to a Lord and King. The whole faith and life of the Republic is based on the democratic theory of freedom for the natural reason and conscience of man to govern him unconstrained. These two theories are in utter contradiction. They cannot always coëxist side by side as they do to-day. The Church and the Republic foster two utterly unlike habits of feeling and thought. For a while men may fancy they accept both theories, and go on obeying a King in their religion and obeying democratic freedom in their politics. But the overwhelming tendency is to assimilate one to the other. The very existence of the Republic is a standing threat to the Church, fostering as it does the very ideas which are making non-Christians by the thousand; and the very existence of the Church is a standing threat to the Republic, fostering as it does the very ideas which are sapping faith in man's power to be a law to himself. To obey my own reason and conscience is not to obey the will of Jesus the Christ. No sophistry can make it the same thing. But I must obey one or the other; and I remain in spiritual discord with myself until I learn to govern all my action, political and religious, by a self-consistent law. The same conflict which thus prevails in my own private life until I become either a thorough Christian royalist or a thorough republican democrat, is at work in the public consciousness. It is preparing the conditions of political strife. The Republic is undermining the Church,—the Church is undermining the Republic,—each to the extent of its power. When the Church comes completely to understand this, she will be put to a most tremendous test. Shall she give up her Christ or her country—her spiritual King or her political freedom? You may be more sanguine than I; but I cannot but believe that she will try to make over the Republic according to the ideas of Christianity,—that she will be then willing to attempt to cure her own inward dissension, and thus avert her great outward danger, by consenting to the effort to acknowledge Jesus as her King in the national Constitution, or by some other plan equally ruinous to the Republic. Do nothing she cannot; she cannot remain permanently inactive before the increasing peril that threatens her. In fact, the signs grow numerous that she begins to appreciate her danger, and to perceive that the chief cause of American "infidelity" to-day is not the influence of foreign thought, but the home influence of the unsectarian, non-Christian United States Constitution. If she ever comes to see this fact in all its momentous significance, she will shrink back in horror from the governmental theory she has been upholding, and will make up her mind that, if republicanism tends to "infidelity," republicanism must be abandoned. That day will be one of great danger, either to her or to the Republic; for then must come in some shape a mighty struggle for existence.

Believing all this, as I do, to be a state of things that must become speedily evident to every reflective person, and that the antagonism is total and irreconcilable between the Church and the Republic, I cannot but ask the question—"What should be the true relation of the two in our own purposes and thought? How ought the State to treat the Church, in view of this deadly hostility which she is rapidly coming to cherish?"

Count Cavour, the great Italian statesman, advocated a "free Church in a free State." If I am right, there can be no such thing as a free Church, for the Church is bound hand and foot to her Master and Lord. But so far as Count Cavour meant simply that the State should be utterly separate from the Church, and give her no comfort or aid, I agree with him. On the one hand, I believe that every wise and patriotic American must sooner or later come to perceive that the best service he can do to his country is to do what he can to lessen the influence of the Church, by educating the people in higher principles and ideas; to help expose the intrinsic untruth and harmfulness of her doctrines, as a patriotic duty. On the other hand, he will assist in abolishing the privileges which the Church enjoys to-day in violation of the spirit of our great Magna Charter. She has not the shadow of a right to receive exemption from the taxes which all good citizens are obliged to pay, or to receive any sectarian appropriation whatever, or to have chaplains appointed and maintained at the public expense, or to enjoy any other privilege as a Church. A settled policy should be begun by which the Church should be deprived of all her unfair advantages. The most rigid impartiality should be observed towards her, and every law giving her exceptional advantage should be repealed. Her private rights should be most scrupulously respected; no Christian should be interfered with in his private belief, no congregation should be interfered with in their public worship. But here the rights of the Church end. She has no right to be excused from one cent of just taxation, or to shift off upon other shoulders her just share of the common burden. She should be stripped of all her perquisites and prerogatives; she should be forbidden to lay her hand on the public schools and insist that the Bible, a book sacred only in her own eyes, should be read as a Divine revelation by the children of believers and unbelievers alike; she should be taught that in America not only is the State absolutely supreme, but that the State is not to know even whether the Church exists or not. Here democratic freedom reigns over all; here Christian royalty is an interloper and usurper; here the conscience and reason of the private soul should give law to life, while the claim of Jesus to be Lord and King of all souls stands in glaring contradiction and open defiance of republican institutions. The State should hold the first place in the affections of every true American heart, and the Church is an enemy to the public peace when she puts forth her claim to govern the nations.

Friends, a Liberal League was organized last winter to carry out and apply more faithfully the principles I have stated. It aims to abolish the exemption from taxation now enjoyed by the Christian Church; to abolish the employment and payment of Christian chaplaincies by the State; to put an end to all open or disguised appropriations of public money for ecclesiastical or sectarian uses; to abolish the practice of Bible-reading in the public schools; to forbid the appointment of Christian festivals or fasts by the government; to substitute simple affirmation for the Christian oath in our courts of justice; to repeal all laws made in the interest of the "Christian Sabbath;" to substitute natural morality and secular justice for all attempts to enforce so-called "Christian morality;" in short, to make the government thoroughly secular in all respects, and get rid of the last vestiges of Christian usurpation in the administration of the State. I appeal to you to support this Liberal League by your sympathy and active aid, and to help every movement looking to the same grand objects. Nothing else can make the Republic strong and safe than the strict and thorough carrying-out of republican ideas in spite of the Church. In the name of republican ideas I declare the Christian Church a foe to the spirit and genius of the government under which we live; and I call upon every true patriot to recognize and appreciate this momentous fact. Just so far as we are faithful to American principles, to democratic principles, to the principles on which the freedom and welfare of humanity depend, must we stand in open and conscious opposition to the Christian Church and its ideas. For the sake of our own posterity, I hope we shall have courage and unselfishness enough to carry the republic forward in the path of its sublime destiny, and see to it that here, at least, one nation shall be governed only by humanity, freedom, and truth.

[For THE INDEX.]

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF JOHN STUART MILL.

The autobiography of such a man as John Stuart Mill must possess a rare interest to all who study the subject of intellectual development; furnishing, as it does, a key to the workings of a master-mind, and a record of the system of education by which such a man was led into the paths he trod so unfalteringly. This system was itself as extraordinary as the results it produced. In his own words:—

"I have thought that in an age in which education and its improvement are the subject of more, if not of profounder study, than at any former period of English history, it may be useful that there should be some record of an education which was unusual and remarkable. . . . It has also seemed to me, that in an age of transition of opinions, there may be somewhat both of interest, and of benefit, in noting the successive phases of any mind which was always pressing forward, equally ready to learn and to unlearn, either from its own thoughts, or from those of others. But a motive which weighs more with me than either of these, is a desire to make acknowledgment of the debt which my intellectual and moral development owes to other persons."

Especially interesting to us, as readers of THE INDEX, are the moral influences by which he was surrounded, and which lent their aid in moulding his character.

His father was anxious to give him, according to his own conception, "the highest order of intellectual training," and, in order to preserve him from "the contaminating influence which boys exercise over boys, and the contagion of vulgar modes of thought and feeling," educated him at home, according to a method of his own. Passing over the intellectual portion of his education, let us look at his moral training.

His father was what the world calls an atheist. Educated in the creed of Scotch Presbyterianism, at the expense of a fund established by Lady Jane Stuart for educating young men for the Scottish Church, and even licensed as a preacher, he (as the result of his own studies and reflection, and on moral rather than intellectual grounds) early rejected "not only the belief in Revelation, but also the foundations of what is commonly called Natural Religion, . . . the turning point of his mind on this subject being the reading of Butler's Analogy; that work . . . proving to him that, whatever are the difficulties in believing that the Old and New Testaments proceed from or record the acts of a perfectly wise and good being, the same and still greater difficulties stand in the way of a belief that a being of such a character can have been the Maker of the Universe."

He therefore not only rejected Christianity, but found no halting place in deism. He looked upon religion, as the term is usually accepted, as "the greatest enemy of morality; first, by setting up fictitious excellencies,—belief in creeds, devotional feelings, and ceremonies, not connected with the good of human-kind,—and causing these to be accepted as substitutes for genuine virtues; but, above all, by radically vitiating the standard of morals; making religion consist in doing the will of a being, on whom it lavishes indeed all the phrases of adulation, but whom in sober truth it depicts as eminently hateful, . . . the most perfect conception of wickedness which the human mind can devise. . . . This ne plus ultra of wickedness he considered to be embodied in what is commonly presented to mankind in the creed of Christianity. Think—he used to say—of a being who would make a hell—who would create the human race with the infallible foreknowledge, and therefore with the intention, that the great majority of them were to be consigned to horrible and everlasting torment. The time, I believe, is drawing near when this dreadful conception of an object of worship will be no longer identified with Christianity; and when all persons, with any sense of moral good and evil, will look upon it with the same indignation with which my father regarded it."

It does indeed seem a most extraordinary condition of moral conceptions, when persons of intelligence can accept a theory involving such a manifest contradiction of terms,—"holding an undoubted belief in an 'Omnipotent author of hell,' and yet identify that being with the best conception they are able to form of Perfect Goodness." The time to which he looked forward, is upon us already, and even the churches are accepting and teaching much of what in that day was looked upon as daring blasphemy.

He was taught from the first, then, "that the question so generally but so foolishly put to children—'Who made you?' cannot be answered, because we have no experience or authentic information from which to answer it; and that any answer only throws the difficulty a step further back, since the question immediately presents itself—'Who made God?'" He was, at the same time, made acquainted with what had been thought and taught by mankind on these impenetrable problems; and taught to take the strongest interest in the Reformation, as the great and decisive contest against priestly tyranny, for liberty of thought.

He was, however, also taught that opinions so contrary to those of the world could not prudently be avowed. This lesson was attended with unavoidable moral disadvantages, especially when he was placed in the alternative of avowal or hypocrisy—in which case he had the boldness to avow his disbelief, and to defend it.

"I think that few men of my father's intellect and public spirit, holding with such intensity of moral conviction as he did unpopular opinions on religion, or any other of the great subjects of thought, would now either practise, or inculcate, the withholding of them from the world. . . . Such an avowal would put an end, at once and forever, to the vulgar prejudice that what is called very improperly unbelief is connected with any bad qualities either of mind or heart. The world would be astonished if it knew how great a proportion of its brightest ornaments—of those most distinguished even in popular estimation for wisdom and virtue—are complete sceptics in religion. . . . Of unbelievers (so called) as well as of believers, there are many species, . . . but the best among them—as no one who has had opportunities of really knowing them will hesitate to affirm—are more genuinely religious, in the best sense of the word religion, than those who exclusively arrogate to themselves the title. . . . They have that which constitutes the principal worth of all religions whatever, an ideal conception of a Perfect Being, to which they habitually refer, as the guide of their conscience; and this ideal of Good is usually far nearer to perfection than the objective Deity of those who think themselves obliged to find absolute goodness in the author of a world so crowded with suffering, and so deformed by injustice as ours."

He was thus brought up, strictly without any religious belief, being, as he says, one of the very few men who have not thrown off a religious belief, from the simple fact of never having had any; growing up in a "negative state" with regard to it, and looking upon modern religion exactly as he did upon that of the Greeks and Romans—a matter which did not in any manner concern him. The standard of moral excellence held up before him was of a lofty character, based upon the inculcations of the Greek philosophers, more especially Socrates and Plato. Although his sentiments were characterized by the Church Journal as "daringly mischievous, and outrageously wild," it is probable that, as Mr. Conway has well said, "If Mr. Mill's intimate friends were, one and all, asked to-day what they considered the profoundest element in their great friend's character, each one would reply—his essential religiousness."

His exposition of the St. Simonian doctrines, written in 1829, is truly prophetic of the Free Religion of to-day:—

"I was greatly struck with the connected view they for the first time presented to me, of the natural order of human progress; and especially with their division of all history into organic periods and critical periods. During the organic periods (they said) mankind accept with firm conviction some positive creed, claiming jurisdiction over all their actions, and containing more or less of truth and adaptation to the needs of humanity. Under its influence they make all the progress compatible with the creed, and finally outgrow it; when a period follows of criticism and negation, in which mankind lose their old convictions, without acquiring any new ones of a general or authoritative character, except the conviction that the old are false. The period of Greek and Roman Polytheism, so long as really believed in by instructed Greeks and Romans, was an organic period, succeeded by the critical or sceptical period of the Greek philosophers. Another organic period came in with Christianity. The corresponding critical period began with the Reformation, has lasted ever since, still lasts, and cannot altogether cease until a new organic period has been inaugurated by the triumphs of a yet more advanced creed. . . . From the trains of thought thus suggested, I obtained a clearer conception than ever before of the peculiarities of an era of transition. . . . I looked forward . . . to a future which shall unite the best qualities of the critical, with the best qualities of the organic periods; unchecked liberty of thought, unbounded freedom of individual action in all modes not hurtful to others; but also convictions as to what is right and wrong, useful or pernicious, . . . so firmly grounded in reason and in the true exigencies of life, that they shall not, like all former and present creeds—religious, ethical, and political—require to be periodically thrown off, and replaced by others."

Although it was said of him that "he died without fear of death, and without hope of heaven"—the following expressions, written several years after the death of his wife would seem to contain at least an intimation of his sense of her continued existence and presence near him: "Since then [the time of her death] I have sought for such alleviation as my state admitted of, by the mode of life which most enables me to feel her still near me. . . . Her memory is to me a religion, and her approbation the standard by which, summing up as it does all worthiness, I endeavor to regulate my life."

However this may be, his own words with regard to his father's death are equally applicable to himself: "'. . . Nor did the approach of death cause the smallest wavering—as in so strong and firm a mind it was impossible that it should—in his convictions on the subject of religion. His principal satisfaction, after he knew that his end was near, seemed to be the thought of what he had done to make the world better than he found it; and his chief regret, in not living longer, that he had not time to do more."

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION AND REV. W. J. POTTER.

BOSTON, Nov. 24, 1873.

DEAR MR. POTTER,—Mr. Frothingham's request to have his name hereafter omitted from the list of Unitarian ministers in our Year Book, and his statement that, had he realized it was there, he should have requested its omission before, leads me to ask some of the men now enrolled there (and among them yourself) whether they are there with their knowledge and consent.

Please let me hear from you on this point, at your earliest convenience. Yours truly,

GEORGE W. FOX, Assistant Secretary.

NEW BEDFORD, Nov. 27, 1873.

DEAR MR. FOX,—I guess Mr. Frothingham is not a member of the American Unitarian Association, and so doesn't see the Year Book. Yes, my name is there with my "knowledge," and, if silence gives consent, then with my "consent." But I never requested that it be placed there, and do not feel moved to make any request about its omission.

The American Unitarian Association authorities must take whatever responsibility there is in the matter. If they say that my "ordination" was an act which indirectly caused my name to be put in the list of Unitarian ministers, then I reply that they must be the judges whether I have done an act which indirectly may be considered a request for its removal. Mr. Frothingham's letter did not satisfy me that we of the Free Religious movement ought to withdraw our names generally. I for one propose to "stick"—until I receive notice to quit. If the American Unitarian Association authorities want our names out of the Year Book, let them not shun the responsibility, but themselves apply the scissors. That at least is my present feeling about it, and the feeling which I have had for some time, when I have considered the question of my own duty. If you can give me any reasons for a different judgment, I shall be most happy to hear them, and will certainly give them consideration. Yours sincerely,

W. J. POTTER.

BOSTON, Nov. 28, 1873.

DEAR MR. POTTER,—In reply to yours of yesterday, allow me to say that, as I understand it, the Year Book lists of societies and of ministers are simply a directory, prepared by the Association for the accommodation of the denomination; and that the Association does not undertake to decide the question as to what are or are not Unitarian societies or ministers, but merely puts into print facts, in the making of which it assumes no responsibility and has no agency.

When Mr. Frothingham was ordained as pastor of the "North Church" in Salem, it was of course understood that he thereby entered the ministry of the Unitarian denomination, and when, afterwards, he became pastor of the "Third Unitarian Congregational Society," in New York, it was still understood, by himself no less than others, that he continued in the ministry of that body. Now, however, he declares himself to be no longer a Unitarian Christian, and so, very properly, requests that his name be dropped from a list of Unitarian Christian ministers.

And so in regard to yourself; when you were ordained over the "First Congregational Society" of New Bedford, it was considered, by yourself as well as all others, as an act by which you entered the ministry of that sect of the Christian Church called Unitarian. If you still claim to be a minister of that denomination, there is no authority here, in this Association, to deny the claim; and your name continues, from year to year, to be published to the world as that of one who calls himself a Unitarian Christian.

My purpose in asking you the question I did was simply to learn whether, possibly, we might not be mistaken in assuming that you continued to be what you were—knowing you to be, to a certain extent, in sympathy with a man who had expressed himself aggrieved at finding his name where he had no desire to have it.

I certainly am very glad that, unlike Mr. Frothingham, you are still willing to call yourself by the same name you assumed on entering the Christian ministry, fourteen years ago. Yours faithfully,

GEORGE W. FOX, Assistant Secretary.

NEW BEDFORD, Dec. 1, 1873.

DEAR MR. FOX,—Thank you for your second letter, more explanatory than the first. Still, it does not convince me that it is my duty to say anything about the propriety of my name being in the Year Book, one way or the other. I still think that those who make up the list of ministers must take whatever responsibility is involved in the matter. Even admitting that the list is only a directory, there must be some definite principles on which the directory is composed; and it is for those who prepare it to say whether, on these principles, my name should be included or not. If any one feels himself under special obligation to withdraw his name, as Mr. Frothingham and Mr. Abbot have done, that, of course, settles the matter for those special cases, but does not settle the question whether the principles on which the list is made would not cover even these cases, had not the request been definitely made that the names should be omitted. But I do not—at least as yet—feel moved to make any such request in my case.

You mistake my position, however, when you say at the close of your letter that you are very glad that I am still willing to call myself a "Unitarian Christian." I do not call myself by that or any denominational name. "Unitarian," of course, I am with reference to the doctrine of the Trinity. But "Christian" I do not now call myself, and have so said in public. Fourteen years ago, when I first entered the ministry, I could and did call myself a "Christian," though caring then little for the name. My general views have not much changed since then, but I then gave to the term "Christian" a broader meaning than I now think it will logically or historically bear. So I no longer claim or assume the name. Still, seeing what wide general meanings are given to the name, I do not feel bound, as some of my coadjutors do, constantly to protest against it, if others choose to consider me entitled to it. For a prior question must then be, "What do you mean by Christian?" I might write much more in explanation of my views on this point, but forbear. The question which you have to consider in regard to the Year Book list, it seems to me, is this: Shall we drop those who do not call themselves "Christian," when they make no request in the premises? Yours sincerely,

WILLIAM J. POTTER.

P.S.—Is there any objection to the subject of your letters being made public?

BOSTON, Dec. 5, 1873.

DEAR MR. POTTER,—There are "some definite principles" on which our Year Book list of ministers is made up, and one of them is to drop from it the names of all persons known to be no longer ministers of the Unitarian denomination, and to do this even "when they make no request in the premises."

As you say "Christian I do not now call myself," there would seem to be no question as to the propriety of hereafter omitting your name.

While there might be no desire to define Christianity in the case of those who may claim that they are in any sense of the term entitled to be called Christians, for those persons who, like yourself, disavow the name, there seems to be no need of raising any question as to how broad a range of opinion the name may properly be stretched to cover.

I see no objection to the subject of my letters being made public, and will furnish both yours and my own, or the substance of them, if you prefer, to the Register for publication.

Sorry to have mistaken the meaning of your former letter in regard to your position,

I am faithfully yours,

GEORGE W. FOX, Assistant Secretary.

NEW BEDFORD, Dec. 10, 1873.

DEAR MR. FOX,—By your last letter, I presume I am to understand that my name is to be omitted from the list of ministers in the Year Book. In this decision I think you have acted consistently with one view of Unitarianism; the view, namely, which regards it as having certain doctrinal limits, and the view which in latter years, since the organization of the National Unitarian Conference fixing the limit at least on one side, appears to have been ecclesiastically strongest. But there is another view of Unitarianism, which seems to me older and more fundamental: the view that it does not so much represent any denominational doctrines as certain mental and spiritual tendencies; that, though it has always had a theology, or, more properly, theologies, historically its dominant animating impulse, and especially in the Channing era, has been the right of free inquiry, and the stress of its emphasis has been laid on the principle that character is to be regarded before dogma. Taking this view, which I confess I rather expected you would take, your decision might have been different. You could have said consistently, "Though some of those on the list of ministers give to the name 'Christian' such a definition as not to include themselves under it, yet we, not professing to define the term so much by doctrinal tests as by tests of character can rightly retain their names (unless they especially request that they be withdrawn), especially when they appear to be the accepted ministers of societies commonly recognized as Unitarian."

I do not say this now with any thought of changing your decision. And I would not say it before, because I did not wish to say anything that might be construed into the expression of a preference that might affect your judgment. I wished you to act with perfect freedom in the matter. You have decided according to the basis laid down by the National Conference, which must be regarded certainly as expressing the present opinion of the larger part of the Unitarian body. And I make no protest against the decision.

I have brought forward this other view of Unitarianism, which seems to me more consonant with what Unitarianism was in its origin, and which has still, I believe, a good deal of strength in the Unitarian body, simply to show how I, though not calling myself a "Christian," might not have felt impelled by any conscientious scruple to withdraw my name from the Year Book, and how I may still consistently feel and hold some affiliation with Unitarian organizations and movements. When I have seen how my honored friends and coadjutors in the Free Religious Association, first Mr. Abbot, and now Mr. Frothingham, were receiving special praise from the religious journals for formally withdrawing from the Unitarian body, their conduct in thus withdrawing being spoken of as particularly "honorable" and "noble," I have been led to ask myself whether I might not be acting a dishonorable and ignoble part by not "withdrawing," since in general religious views I stood on essentially the same platform with them. It has seemed clear, too, that not to withdraw was rather to run the risk of appearing to others to be in the unenviable attitude of standing on a theological fence, a position which is repugnant to every fibre of my nature. Still, though faithfully sounding all my motives, and having the sincerest respect for the motives of my friends which led them to a formal disavowal of Unitarian fellowship, I can honestly say that I have not been able to find any call either in reason or conscience to follow their example. And the cause of this different perception of duty I think is this: that I, more than they, feel the force of the fact that Unitarianism is the high road over which many of us have journeyed to the religious ground we now occupy, and that numerous others are fast following by the same way to the same results. In other words, I believe that there is a natural, logical, and historical "complicity" between Unitarianism and the Free Religious position, a "complicity" not to be shunned on either side, and which, though verbally disavowed, none the less exists. The "complicity" which Mr. Frothingham, apparently for the relief of others more than himself, would avoid seems to me to be that "complicity" of kinship by hereditary law, responsibility for which is not to be escaped from.

Therefore, though my name will not stand in the list of Unitarian ministers, I shall still consider myself as having to some extent affiliations with the Unitarian body. By the generosity of another I am a life member of the Unitarian Association, and have always continued to feel some interest in its work. I do not know that any escape is possible from such a title of membership. But I have never thought it worth while to inquire. Though not calling myself a "Christian," I have felt that I could in a degree consistently coöperate with an Association whose object is to promote the interests of "pure Christianity," believing that those who put that phrase into its constitution had preëminently in mind practical religion rather than any system of theology; and, though there is much pertaining to the work of the Association which neither attracts my sympathies nor meets the approval of my thought, I can yet honestly welcome it as an aid in the great movement for spiritual emancipation and progress which is going on in Christendom. Mainly, however, my sympathies and energies must now be given to another Association, which accords much more nearly with my present thought, and which, however imperfectly, and with whatever mistakes of individual actors, represents that larger spiritual movement of our age which, unlimited by any lines of speculative belief or by the boundaries that separate the specific religions, is aiming at grounds of faith and fellowship as universal as humanity. Whatever in Unitarianism is sectarian and dogmatic, or so seems to me, I am compelled to oppose as a hindrance to this larger aim. But whatever in it is helpful to this larger end (and there is much), I most cordially acknowledge. And with the many friends I have in the ranks of its ministry I trust still to keep the same pleasant, personal, and professional fellowship which has marked our intercourse in the years that are past.

Sincerely yours, WILLIAM J. POTTER.

[For THE INDEX.]

AN OPEN LETTER

TO GEO. W. FOX, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

DEAR SIR:—

Since the time of Theodore Parker, there has probably been no act more indicative or significant than your erasure from the Year Book of the name of William J. Potter. A very simple thing indeed to do, if by it you did not lay down a principle, establish a precedent, and proclaim to the world the policy of a whole denomination.

The facts occasioning your action were these: O. B. Frothingham, President of the Free Religious Association, finding his name in the Year Book an annoyance to his weaker brethren in the ministry, as implying that they countenanced and shared his opinions, in strict accordance with his customary courtesy, kindly withdrew it. But, in your interrogation to Mr. Potter whether or not he would like to do the same, he replied substantially as follows: "I do not feel in the premises like Mr. Frothingham. If you see fit to erase my name, it must be upon your own responsibility." A position, it seems to me, quite as wise as that of Mr. Frothingham seemed manly. Not satisfied with this, you catch upon a casual expression of his concerning Christian profession; and then there comes down your guillotine, and the seventh seal of the American Unitarian Association is opened. For it must be remembered that this step of yours is not different in kind from the anathemas of the Romish Church; and, unless the fellowship of souls on earth be less limited than the communion of the saints in heaven, what by Christ's Church is loosed on earth shall be loosed in heaven.

But the real consequences that lie in wait, or the disasters impending, I am unable to see, since the Register, in proclaiming Mr. Potter no longer a Unitarian Christian minister, announces that he will remain still the minister of a Unitarian Christian Church. Such a fermentation must indicate that in Unitarianism there has already got to be the maximum amount of new wine that can be injected into Orthodox bottles, or else that an excommunication from their almanac is the utmost limit to their inquisitorial powers.

Now, while deprecating sadly the logic that should lead you to it, I am glad that you have taken this subject in hand. There has hitherto been altogether too much mushy concession among the Unitarians. They ought to tally closer up to their professions. Weed them out! Send an interrogatory circular to every doubtful case. Let us know who are on the Lord's side.

But what will you do with those who might deem such a question an impertinence,—such as have left the labelling business and taken up that of their fathers, who, like Emerson, instead of blowing a trumpet, would prefer to let their works and life label them? You are aware, I suppose, that in State Street, if a man should call himself a Christian, it would immediately evoke suspicions, if it did not consign him to the Coventry of general contempt. There one's character and standing offer sufficient tests; and a profession, instead of promoting sincerity or reality, would finally come to stand in the place of the thing professed. But where an individual is so "universally known and respected" as you say Mr. Potter is, what is the significance of his profession? Acknowledging his worth, because he does not do it, you exclude him. Does the husbandman throw away the best wheat because it has lost its tag, or gather up chaff because it has one on? Why, then, are the children of this world wiser than the children of light? One would suppose from the Register's compliments that it would first hang Mr. Potter, and then erect a monument under the gallows.

Now what is a Christian? This you ought first to settle very definitely. It ought to be so plain that a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein; if for nothing else, than because you make so much to hang upon it. Is "Christian" an expression of the heart or a definition of the head? If the former, was not Mr. Frothingham far more a Christian after the generous act that so unchristianized him? If the latter, is it a solemn fact that among your communion Mr. Potter's intellectual honesty is so criminal an offence as to be punishable with expulsion, and extend to such an extent as to determine the dividing line between the sheep and the goats? If by "Christian" is meant a certain tone, temper, disposition, and quality of life, ought not, then, Mr. Potter's confession to bring down upon him the publican's blessing rather than the Pharisee's rebuke? Certainly his denial cannot be classified with Peter's,—that of a lack of moral courage. Neither would the Register condemn him as falling away in grace, since then the corresponding corollary would hold true: if all who deny Christ are bad people, it must also follow that all who acknowledge him are saints—a shocking conclusion! But if by "Christian" is meant the acceptance of some dogma about Christ, his person or mission, then it is equally certain that Christ himself was no Christian. So there are good men who do not accept such dogmas, as we also have plenty of bad men who do. Then is there, certainly, no inevitable interdependence between such dogmas and high character. What, therefore, taken separately, reduces your Christianity into awkward dilemmas cannot be said to constitute a Christian when taken together. Then he should have enough dogma to give to character a peculiar flavor, and as much manliness as would not impede a proper dogmatic expression.

But I understand it is the policy of your denomination not to curtail too much its definition, but to allow the largest individual liberty. "A man," says the Liberal Christian, "may be a pantheist or an atheist, and if he call himself a Christian, he may join the Unitarian Conference." But what if a Christian calls himself an atheist, what then? Why, he would, of course, be excluded. Where, then, lies the significance attached to this word, except it be in the mere act of calling? Is it possible that the traditional reverence in your communion for this name is so peculiarly quaint in character that it is willing to swear over a bare husk, within which nothing is left to be sworn over? Then, at least, have we come to the Irishman's definition of nothing—"a footless stocking without legs." A compass it is which acts like quicksilver, a chart that is confusion, a vane that is the wind, a denominational currency that can only turn to the American Unitarian Association to find a gold basis. Its beauty is in its utter elasticity; here it takes on the hues of a chameleon, now it assumes the proportions of a camel, then it looks like a weasel, again it puts on the magnitude of a whale, and the more the transformation, the more Christian. Such a school of theology Huxley would call a "biographical No-Man's-Land." You speak in your Year Book of Christians as "followers of Christ;" may not, then, the Free Religionists (borrowing the above latitude of definition) excommunicate as unchristian your Association? Are they not doing to the popular religion just what Jesus did to that of his time? They would do away with "Churchianity," as he endeavored to do away with Judaism. How can history repeat itself, except, in bringing about the same results, the same causes are instituted? But you cannot be expected to appreciate this, although it comes within the scope of your liberty of construction. Had you done so, you would never have cried aloud so often, "liberty in Christ." Could you have gone out of your prepossessions, you would have seen that Free Religious heresy was no other than Unitarian heresy; and that all this cry about "liberty in Christ" was as foolish as "liberty in Mohammed" or atmosphere in a vacuum. So, because Mr. Potter, in your Christian trumpet, cannot blow hot and blow cold, you are going to leave him out in the cold to be blown. On this anniversary of the tea-spillers, you have set him adrift with all his "sweetness and light." Mr. Frothingham, with his honor and scholarly fairness, you have let go, and with Mr. Abbot you have broken because of his logical accuracy and devotion to truth. Now, were it possible, you might send Higginson away, and disfellowship Lucretia Mott because of her saintly womanhood and spotless life. But then the simplest instinct of the street would be able to detect the stripe of that remaining communion that holds up the denominational turkey as the prize of its high calling. For that is what the second stages of sectarian as well as political organizations arrive at, when they lose the spirit for the letter, which John Randolph styled "the zealous support of seven great Scripture principles, summed up in the five loaves and the two fishes." Instead of holding up as heretofore the star of liberty, your mission will dwindle to a vigilance committee over heresy, or become a victualling station to flying fugitives on the road from Rome to Reason. In your denominational treatment of Theodore Parker, you offered the noblest opportunity for an ostracized heretic to prove himself more Christian than his Christian accusers. From that sight the devoted Channing might have turned in his coffin to point the finger of rebuke! But when, still later, you let slip the golden opportunity of vindicating religious liberty as broad as the race and to all the sons of God, you again presented to the world the humiliating spectacle of seeing the cream of your communion march off, waving in your faces the banners of that very freedom which had hitherto been your only boast! At such a sight the angels well might weep; for, in that very hour, not only did there return the ghost of Theodore Parker, but it was the very form and voice of Christ, exclaiming in holy indignation: "YE ECCLESIASTICS, CHILDREN OF THE SCRIBES AND PHARISEES, WHO MURDERED ME, FILL YE UP THE FULL MEASURE OF YOUR FATHERS!"

And in this last act, are you really following him or crucifying him anew? Interpreted by the suffering at Antioch and the martyrdoms of Rome, are you more Christian? Or, following after the anise and cummin, resemble you most the Pharisees at Jerusalem? Instead of a great and enlightened denomination leading progress, are you not comparatively hindering it? Instead of uniting mankind in brotherly love, are you not setting them ajar in unprofitable disputes? Instead of making straight the pathway of the Lord and lifting the heavy burdens from the oppressed, are you not making it more crooked, placing stumbling blocks in the way, and occupying yourselves in raking over the fires of a little Unitarian inquisition? Yours for clearness and charity,

CHARLES THOMAS FOWLER.

FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF CHICAGO.

PREAMBLE AND CONSTITUTION.

PREAMBLE.

Holding these truths to be self-evident, that truth, justice, and fraternity are, and should be, ruling principles of true humanity;

And recognizing the fact that the human reason is the only umpire of truth, and that truth is the sole basis of justice and fraternity, and that association upon a platform of free thought and equal rights is the best means for promoting true civilization;

We therefore associate ourselves under the above name, and agree to abide by the following

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1. Name.—This society shall be called the Free Religious Society of Chicago.

ART. 2. Objects.—Its objects are the elevation of humanity through the study of truth in moral philosophy and science, and the promotion of fraternity and true fellowship.

ART. 3. Membership.—Membership in this society embraces all who sign the constitution. But only those who contribute not less than one dollar annually to the support of the society shall be permitted to vote in its management.

ART. 4. Opinions.—Members of this society are responsible to themselves only for any opinions they may severally hold upon religious or other questions, and membership in other societies, religious or secular, shall not be a bar to membership in this.

ART. 5. Officers.—The officers of this society shall consist of a president, one or more vice-presidents, a secretary, and standing committees of finance and music.

ART. 6. Elections.—The officers and standing committees shall be elected annually at the first regular meeting of the society in the month of December.

Special elections to fill vacancies may occur, however, at any regular meeting.

ART. 7. Amendments.—This constitution may be altered or amended at any regular meeting by a two-thirds vote of the members present, notice of such amendment having been given in writing at least one week before said vote is taken.

N. B.—The books of this society are open, and may be found at the Hall each Sunday, and all persons in sympathy with it are respectfully and sincerely invited to become members by signing the constitution personally, or by authorizing some member of the society to sign it for them. This society is sustained solely by the free contributions of its members and friends; all are therefore solicited to aid it with such contributions in cash, or subscriptions payable in weekly or monthly instalments, as their hearts may prompt them to give.

THE KING AND THE ANTS.—According to Jewish and Mohammedan tradition, King Solomon, who was beyond all other men, knew the language of animals, and could talk with the beasts of the field and the birds of the air. A Rabbinical story is told of him, which is on this wise: One day the king rode out to Jerusalem with a great retinue. An ant-hill lay directly in his path, and Solomon heard its little people talking.

"Here comes the great king," one of them said. "His flatterers call him wise and just and merciful; but he is about to ride over and crush us, without heeding our sufferings."

Solomon told the Queen of Sheba, who rode with him, what the ant said: and the queen made answer, "He is an insolent creature, O king! It is a better fate than he deserves to be trodden under our feet!"

But Solomon said, "It is the part of wisdom to learn of the lowest and weakest." And he commanded his train to turn aside and spare the ant-hill.

Then all the courtiers marvelled greatly, and the Queen of Sheba bowed her head and made obeisance to Solomon, and said, "Now know I the secret of thy wisdom. Thou listenest as patiently to the reproaches of the humble as to the flatteries of the great."—J. G. Whittier.

THE EVERGREEN LYRE:

A CHRISTMAS GIFT FROM A DEAR FRIEND.

Mute on my wall thou art,
With marvellous music slumbering in thy heart:
Music that charms my waking dream,
And makes thee seem Accomplice in my unmelodious part!
For thou and I are numb,
While cunning Nature whispers—"Come!
Pour forth the song within;
All else is alien din;
Thy life grows starved and bleak because 'tis dumb.
Let the world wag as't may;
Each dog must have his day;
Sing thy brief song, ere golden turns to gray."
Alas, and art thou set
Upon my wall reproachful watch to keep,
And feed the fountain of regret,
Thou outward mimic of a soul asleep?
Nay—rather hang thou there
To prophesy a day more fair,
When every soul shall be a lyre,
And tremble with celestial fire,
And turn to song each vulgar care;
When from discordant hopes and fears
Music shall rise,—the sweeter, clearer,
That some have toiled through tuneless years
To bring that music nearer.
Yet would this hand might wake thy silent strings
To mate the strains that godlike Freedom sings,— Exultant now as victor's pæan,
Storming with joy the empyréan;
Now tender as a mother's ditty,
Soothing her babe with love and pity;
Now solemn as cathedral bell,
Tolling slow a monarch's knell;
Now wild and full of fiery haste
As zebra's hoof-beats o'er the waste;
Indignant now as Ocean's roar,
Hurling his thunders 'gainst the shore;
Now reverent as the hosts that feel
The impassioned organ's grand appeal,
And lift their hearts on high, and kneel,—
That thus the embryo Faith might live and breathe,
Burst into song, and to the coming time
The full-sphered music of the Truth bequeathe,
Deep, sweet, sublime!
Not mine the joy, alas!
To cheer the feeble and to charm the sage,
To raise the anthem of that dawning age,
And chant great Nature's Mass.
Yet still, divinely taught,
Be mine this lustrous thought:
Not tuneless he who rights a wrong,
Or smites a fetter clinging,—
Not songless he who makes his life a song,
And sets the world to singing!

SUNDAY LECTURES.—The Editors of The Index will lecture occasionally on Sundays, if desired, within a convenient distance of Boston.

CASH PREMIUMS FOR 1874.

In order to increase the circulation of The Index, and thereby make it a more powerful instrumentality in the reform to which it is devoted, the following Cash Premiums are now offered:—

1. The Index will pay to any one of its old subscribers $1.00 for every new subscription of $3.00 obtained by his or her means and forwarded to this office. If preferred, the $1.00 may be deducted before remitting. This offer holds good for new subscriptions alone, and not for renewals.

2. In addition to this, it offers One Hundred Dollars to the person who shall send the largest list of new subscribers, with the money, before the first day of February, 1874, and Fifty Dollars to the person sending the next largest list during the same time.

There are many warm friends of The Index throughout the country who would be glad to help increase its circulation, if they could only afford to give their time to the work. The above offers will enable them to do so. Supposing that the largest list sent contains one hundred new names, the sender will be entitled to $100.00 as commission and another $100.00 as premium. Will not many of our lady subscribers, who are the most efficient of all canvassers, seize this opportunity to help The Index without too great a sacrifice on their own part?

GLIMPSES.

A correspondent writes us that, out of the 10,000 Jews in Philadelphia, "there is but one female in the Insane Department of the Almshouse, and but two in the county jail for minor offences."

In Adrian, Michigan, is published a German weekly paper, heartily devoted to liberalism, which ought to be supported well by the Germans. It is called Der Reformator, and is edited by C. Lohmann. Subscription price, $2.00 a year.

Especial attention is invited to the list of lecturers and subjects in the Course of "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," to be given in Horticultural Hall this winter,—as usual, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association. This Course has become almost an established institution, and attracts the interest of all who wish to hear the last word of religious radicalism.

A friend in Chicago writes under date of Dec. 22: "We had a splendid meeting last night in the Free Religious Society. Robert G. Ingersoll, a prominent lawyer (formerly State Attorney) of Peoria, Illinois, gave us a lecture on 'Individuality' which electrified the large and very intelligent audience by its flashes of wit and common sense, warming the heart at the same time by sentiments of true humanity, and by no means lacking in humorous criticism on the followers of Authority. As an orator, in elocution and address, he is admirable; and the humor sparkling in his eyes and gestures is perfectly charming."

The Christian Register is just now filled with admiration of all ministers who are stirred up to define their positions, and who refuse to enjoy the advantages of an ambiguous attitude. It holds that all who consider themselves non-Christians should pack up their carpet-bags, and quit the society of those who avow themselves Christians. We postpone for the present all discussion of this point; but we must say frankly that the same rule applies to denominations that applies to individual ministers. We shall think more highly of the Christian Register when it ceases to profess entire spiritual freedom, and honestly confesses that "Unitarian Christianity" has its dogmatic limitation in the Christian name.

With the free and hearty consent of the author, the publication of "Paul Gower" is now discontinued in The Index. It was expected that the whole of the novel would be published within the year 1873; but the necessary reduction of the paper's size last spring precluded the possibility of this, and nearly half of the story remains unpublished. Under these circumstances, it is undesirable, whether as regards the author, the public, or The Index itself, to continue its publication in a manner so fragmentary as to do it great injustice. We hope that a publisher may be found to give it a fair chance in book form, and that Paul's theological experience, as recounted in the interesting thirty-seventh chapter just concluded, may secure for it a wide sale among liberal readers.

The Boston Traveller of Dec. 22 has this editorial paragraph:—

"The Boston Liberal League is just now attempting to shape public sentiment in favor of a repeal of the laws under which churches and property owned by educational, scientific, literary, benevolent, and charitable associations are exempted from taxation. The animus of the League is unquestionably opposition to the churches, but it cannot well strike at them without hitting the other associations named. This question is now attracting much interest all over the country, and the most powerful opposition to repeal will not be that which comes from the churches. Indeed, it is not probable that the change proposed would greatly affect the larger portion of the Protestant churches of this Commonwealth, as the amount to be taxed upon the churches would be saved to their individual members by the lower rate of taxation that would be a result of repeal."

The lists of signatures to the "Anti-Exemption Petitions" are beginning to come in. Mr. George H. Foster, of Boston, has brought in a list of two hundred and fifty-one names, and the Banner of Light courteously sends us one of fifty-seven names, collected by Mr. F. J. Symes, of Cleveland, Ohio,—both lists belonging under the "Congressional Petition." Mr. R. H. Ranney, of Boston, has also handed in a list of forty signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition." It is hoped that similar lists will be collected and forwarded without delay; but let every name be enrolled that can be secured. The amount of the indirect tax imposed on individuals by church-exemption is trivial, it is true; but a great principle is at stake, and the spirit of the Boston "Tea-Spillers" of 1773 is a noble one to remember.

Some interesting correspondence between Mr. Potter and the Assistant Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, copied from the Christian Register, will be found on a previous page. It was originally suggested by the following paragraph in the Register of Nov. 8:—

"The Secretary of the American Unitarian Association has received a note from Rev. O. B. Frothingham, of New York, in which he says: 'I can understand why my society is counted among Unitarian societies, for it was incorporated under that title, and has never changed its name. But why my name should be retained in the Year Book of the Association, when I have so openly disavowed all connection with the Unitarians, I cannot understand. Had I been aware of its presence there, I should have done what it occurs to me to do now—requested its withdrawal. Not that I have the smallest objection to appearing in such excellent company, but because I wish to sail under no false colors, and would save others from complicity with my opinions.'"

The new Constitution of Pennsylvania, as shown in another column by Mr. Pillsbury, disqualifies for office those who do not "acknowledge the being of a God and a future state of rewards and punishments,"—an outrage none the less heinous because it is but the reënactment of the same provision in the old Constitution. But in the new Preamble the Christian Amendment party have gained an important victory, accomplishing at least part of their purpose to "put God into the Constitution." Says the Philadelphia Christian Statesman, the well-known organ of this party: "The language of this Preamble, 'We, the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, grateful to Almighty God for the blessings of civil and religious liberty, and humbly invoking his guidance, do ordain and establish this Constitution,' contains the germ of the whole doctrine of national religion. And although the vote which struck out the clause, originally reported by the Committee, acknowledging the 'sovereignty' of God, showed a singular ignorance of the subject with which they were dealing, yet we regard the Preamble as a notable gain to the cause of political Christianity, and as destined to play an important part in the controversies of the future." Stealthily does the "cause of political Christianity" make its advances, and fortify point after point as it gains them. May the nation not be at last like Gulliver, waking to find itself fettered and enslaved by an infinite number of tiny cords thus craftily fastened upon its sleeping limbs!

WANTED:

A RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT TO THE United States Constitution.

The First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, in consequence of ratification by three-fourths of the States, became a part of the Constitution on December 15, 1791, is as follows: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

We submit to the public a proposition that this First Amendment shall be made to read as follows:—

ARTICLE I.

"Section 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

"Section 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

"Section 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation."

The necessity of this enlargement of the First Amendment, in order to secure to the people the full and unrestricted enjoyment of religious liberty, is apparent for two reasons:—

1. The Tenth Amendment to the United States Constitution expressly provides that—"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people;" and the Constitution itself, although providing by the third clause of Article VI. that—"No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States,"—nevertheless contains no provision prohibiting the several States from establishing a State religion, or requiring a religious test for office, or disqualifying witnesses in the courts on account of their religious opinions, or otherwise restricting their religious liberty.

2. In consequence of this defect in the United States Constitution, some of the States are, as a matter of fact, actually guilty of grave infringements on the religious liberty of their citizens. The following State provisions establishing a religious test for office in point:—

The Constitution of Maryland declares—"That no religious test ought ever to be required as a qualification for any office of profit or trust in this State, other than a declaration of belief in the existence of God." [Decl. of Rights, 37.]

The Constitution of North Carolina declares that—"The following classes of persons shall be disqualified for office: First, all persons who shall deny the being of Almighty God." [VII, 5.]

The Constitution of South Carolina declares that—"No person who denies the existence of the Supreme Being shall hold any office under this Constitution." [XIV, 6.]

The Constitution of Mississippi declares that—"No person who denies the existence of the Supreme Being shall hold any office in this State." [XII, 3.]

The Constitution of Tennessee declares that—"No person who denies the being of God, or a future state of rewards and punishments, shall hold any office in the civil department of this State." [IX, 2.]

The Constitution of Pennsylvania declares—"That no person who acknowledges the being of God and a future state of rewards and punishments shall, on account of his religious sentiments be disqualified to hold any office or place of trust or profit under this Commonwealth." [IX, 4.] This clause has just been reënacted by the people of Pennsylvania in the new Constitution adopted on the sixteenth day of last October; and it is interpreted to mean the positive disqualification for office of all persons who do not profess the beliefs referred to. "The recognition of a God and of a future state of rewards and punishments," says Hough, in his standard work entitled American Constitutions [Vol. II, p. 220. Albany: 1872], "was still demanded of all holding office; but a belief in the Divine inspiration of the Old and New Testaments was not included." It should also be remembered that the new Constitution of this State contains a recognition of God in its Preamble which was not contained in the old Preamble,—a result directly due to the efforts of the "God in the Constitution" party, and a virtual admission of their general principle that the State, as such, is bound to recognize God.

Further, the Constitution of Maryland declares—"Nor shall any person, otherwise competent, be deemed incompetent as a witness or juror on account of his religious belief; provided he believes in the existence of God, and that, under His dispensation, such person will be held morally accountable for his acts, and be rewarded or punished therefor, either in this world or the world to come." [Declaration of Rights, 36.] Tyler, in his American Ecclesiastical Law, after stating that "the Christian religion is the recognized religion of the country, and is a part of the common law of many of the States," goes on to refer to the prohibition by the United States Constitution of a religious test of office, and of an establishment of religion; but he adds: "Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of the Federal Constitution, in several of the States certain religious opinions are requisite to receiving the oath of a witness in courts." [page 22.] Even in Massachusetts, the State Constitution has been construed by the Legislature, in the General Statutes of 1860, to permit an enactment of this nature: "Every person not a believer in any religion is required to testify truly, under the pains and penalties of perjury; and the evidence of such persons disbelieving in the existence of God may be received to affect his credibility." In other words, an appeal in the courts to the public prejudice against atheists, however irrelevant to the subject matter of their testimony, and however irreproachable may be their character, is legally approved by the State of Massachusetts.

These and other interferences with religious rights by the several State Constitutions, and the innumerable statutory provisions enacted in the same spirit, together with the more or less frequent acts of oppression growing out of them, would be prohibited as unconstitutional, if the Freedom Amendment should become part of the supreme law of the land. It is needed to carry out the essential purpose, the fundamental idea, on which the whole Constitution rests. If the United States are one nation,—if they are destined more and more to be inspired by the same "enthusiasm of humanity" which gave the nation birth,—if all parts of every nation must, as a condition of healthy national life, be governed by one homogeneous law, and vivified by one common spirit,—then the Freedom Amendment is in some shape absolutely essential to the future greatness and happiness of our country. Its ratification would be the death-warrant of all attempts to pervert the Constitution to the service of Roman Catholicism or any other form of Christianity; for such an extension and strengthening of the purely secular principle of government would set the seal of hopelessness on every such attempt, even to the satisfaction of its most undaunted supporters. But the proposition of this new Amendment is not made at all in the spirit of a bellicose partisanship: on the contrary, it is made with the strongest conviction that consistency with democratic ideas is the absolute condition of a permanent republic; that this consistency must be found both in our national and State Constitutions; and that the only way to ensure it in our State Constitutions is to assimilate them to our national Constitution by virtue of some such provision as we now propose. In the opening paper of this issue we have uncompromisingly declared the profound antagonism existing between the two fundamental ideas of the Republic and the Church; and we now appeal to the country to take such a step as shall ensure the final victory to the idea of the Republic. Not hastily, not bitterly, not combatively, do we make this appeal; but rather with a deep desire that we of this generation shall be wise for our posterity, and bequeathe to it a supreme law freed from the last, lingering traces of a poisonous ecclesiasticism.

MR. MORSE'S PARKER.

In a notice of Mr. Morse's bust of Mr. Parker, copied into THE INDEX and meant to be very complimentary to him, occurs this expression: "Mr. Morse has carefully avoided idealizing the head of Mr. Parker." I wish in the name of Art to protest against this misuse of the glorious word "ideal." If Mr. Morse had done what his critic suggests, his next best thing would be to throw his clay into the ash barrel, and go to some honest work for a living. On the contrary, he has most conscientiously sought, from all the records of Mr. Parker's face as well as from reminiscences of his life and character, to catch the true idea of the man, and to re-present it in the lineaments of his face; in short, to idealize the portrait by giving not the accidental effect of the moment, but the permanent characteristics, the true idea, of the man. If he had not done so, what advantage would his work have over the photograph or the plaster cast of the head itself? This idealizing is an entirely different thing from smoothing away all character into mere prettiness, as is so often done. This Mr. Morse certainly has not done.

He has undertaken a task of great difficulty; and, if he has not accomplished perfection, he has given us a very earnest and thoughtful likeness of Mr. Parker, which in some views is very satisfactory, and will afford great pleasure to hundreds of his admirers who did not know his living face.

We hope the success of this bust, which is under life size, will encourage Mr. Morse to undertake a life-size bust of his great subject, on which he can work with greater freedom, and use to advantage all he has learned from the close study of the head on this smaller scale.

E. D. C.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—An event has occurred since my last letter which is, I believe, pregnant with vast results to the progress of Free Religious thought in this country.

The Dean of Westminster, well known, beloved, respected, and dreaded, according to the view taken of his policy, has been doing a bold stroke of innovation at which the hearts of all lovers of liberty rejoice, and all lovers of dogmatic bondage tremble.

He invited to lecture in the nave of Westminster Abbey—and on the "Day of Intercession for Missions" too—a layman; no less a heterodox celebrity than Professor Max Müller, of Oxford, the learned author of Lectures on the Science of Language and Lectures on the Science of Religion.

There was of course a large concourse assembled to hear him, and he was supported by the presence of the Dean and other clergy attached to the Abbey.

The subject of his lecture was "Missions," and in this lies all the sting which his words would have inflicted on the average Orthodox mind. On a day set apart for special prayer to God to prosper the work of conversion among the "Heathen," and in the first ecclesiastical building of the first city in Christendom, a layman reads a homily to the missionaries and those who send them, the spirit of which is the very opposite of that in which they were born and bred, the most foreign to all their religious predilections. I cannot do better than give you some extracts from the lecture itself.

The Professor began by contrasting the three great missionary religions of the world; namely, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity, with the three great non-missionary religions, namely, Judaism, Brahmanism, and Zoroastrianism; pointing out that the missionary element was a sign of vitality. His first shot was this:—

"All these religions had a history, for religions are not unchangeable. Indeed, if they cease to grow and change, they cease to live."

The reason why he commends missionary zeal is thus expressed:—

"There are two kinds of missionary work; and religions which could boast of men who left home and friends, and spent lives of toil and danger among strangers, were also rich in those honest and intrepid inquirers, who, at the bidding of the same spirit of truth, were ready to leave behind them the cherished creed of their childhood, to separate from their friends, to stand alone among men who shrugged their shoulders and asked, 'What is Truth?' and to bear in silence a martyrdom more galling often than death itself."

"Truth neither should nor could be concealed. What is there in this short life that should seal our lips? What shall we wait for, if we are not to speak here and now? There is missionary work to be done at home as well as abroad. There are thousands waiting to listen, if but one man will speak the truth and nothing but the truth."

"There may be times when silence is gold and speech silver; but there are times also when silence is death, and speech is life—the very life of Pentecost."

Rebuking the slavish fear of each other which besets the clergy especially, the Professor asks: "Are the laity afraid of the clergy, the clergy of the laity? What clergyman will not respect honest doubt more than unquestioning faith? Surely, we know that the clear voice of honesty and humility draws more hearts than the harsh accents of dogmatic assurance or ecclesiastical exclusiveness." We only wish the Professor may be right in this flattering estimate.

The most remarkable feature in this wonderful lecture was the allusion made to the Theistic movement in India under Keshub Chunder Sen, with whom we English Theists have exhanged formal tokens of sympathy and good-will. In praising them in India, the Professor virtually praises us, and certainly Westminster Abbey was not the place from which we expected so grand and generous an acknowledgment.

"We need not wonder," he says, "that the Brahmo Somaj has found little favor in the eyes of our missionaries, who feel towards Keshub Chunder Sen much as Athanasius might have felt towards Ulfilas, the Arian Bishop of the Goths. Yet what would have become of Christianity in Europe but for these Arian heretics?

"The movement of religious reform in India is, in my mind, the most momentous in this momentous century. Though our missionaries may repudiate it, history would be more just, and would recognize it as the work, if not of Christian missionaries, of those missionary Christians who have lived in India examples of a true Christian life. These native Indian Puritans are with us, and we with them, for all the highest purposes of life, even though they may not repeat our creeds, nor sign our articles."

In an eloquent appeal to forsake theological warfare for the higher objects of true religion, the Professor says: "If missionaries admit to their fold converts who can hardly understand the abstract conceptions of our creeds and formulas, is it necessary to exclude those who understand them but too well to submit the wings of their free spirit to such galling chains?

"When we try to think of the majesty of God, what are all these formulas but the stammering of children? The essentials of our religion are not in our belief, but in our love; in our love of God, and in our love of man founded on our love of God. This is the whole law and the prophets. This is the religion to be preached to the whole world. This is the gospel which will conquer all other religions, which will comfort the hearts of all men. There can never be too much love, though there may be too much faith, particularly when it leads to the requirement of exactly the same measure of faith in others."

Whether or not the Orthodox champions will be too stunned to reply to this tremendous attack, we are quite safe in predicting that it is only the beginning of a series of similar lectures, and have only to hope that every succeeding lecturer at Westminster Abbey may possess the combined gentleness and courage of Professor Max Müller.

Very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E., Dec. 10, 1873.

SOME YEARS since, quite a famous law-school existed in a quiet town in Central Massachusetts. The principal church in the village was one in which wealth, piety, and conservatism, and no lack of love existed. But somehow the latter was a hidden fire that rarely made itself visible, and it needed something special to cause it to be developed externally. At the time specified, it was drawn out in this wise: Two of the law students on a certain Sabbath strayed into the church, where they were strangers, walked its whole length to the pulpit, and not a door of a single pew was opened or a single seat offered to them. With quiet dignity they turned and marched out again, went about a mile to the school, and then returning with chairs made their appearance in church again, coolly seating themselves in the broad aisle. They had no trouble after that time in finding open doors in that church, and, as has been remarked by a leading lawyer of the town, "that was the best sermon ever preached in that church!" We remember once, in Philadelphia, going to morning service with a young man who was not in the habit of attending church, and although there were plenty of vacant seats, not one was offered to the two young strangers. One of them, after helping himself to a seat directly under the pulpit, remained a few moments, and then walked out, saying, "I've not attended church before for two years, and I certainly am good for another two years' absence."—Advance.

Literary Notices.

By-and-By: An Historical Romance of the Future. By Edward Maitland, author of the Pilgrim and the Shrine, Higher Law, etc. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1873.

The aim of this work is to show the results of continued progress, in their application to art, science, social life, religion, and government, and to depict the condition of the world when such advances have been made, that, in the words of the author, "individuals are able, without penalty or reproach, to fashion their lives according to their own preferences, the sole external limitation being that imposed by the law of equal liberty to all." It opens with a party on an "aëromotive," homeward bound from a sojourn at the North Pole. Travelling in the air is as common as railroad travelling now. The universal network of telegraph wires enables one from almost any point, on land or sea, to communicate with any other desired point. All the wonderful conditions of things described were brought about by "the glorious emancipation," the dawning of which appeared in the nineteenth century—"the divine method of the universe having been revealed in evolution." The Church is made free through the agency of the scientific spirit, and its contests are between "dogmatism and science, credulity and knowledge, assumption and proof." On the cathedral built from the sale of churches and chapels of the various sects into which the population had been divided is inscribed, "All sects abandon, ye who enter here." Affairs on a large scale are regulated by a Confederacy of Nations, but war is had recourse to for adjusting difficulties with peoples not yet sufficiently advanced to be admitted into the Confederacy. The enfranchisement of woman is limited to matters purely social. No longer called upon in the struggle for existence to sell themselves, either with or without marriage, for the means of existence women are guided by their affections, and the "social evil" is done away with. Marriages are not irrevocable, but some control by the State is considered indispensable, and unions without contract are held in universal reprobation. The author is evidently opposed to extending the right of suffrage to woman. He does not believe her constituted to enter the arena of politics. He thinks no training can prevent the emotional from predominating in her nature, and that, intellectually, she cannot be the companion of man. The scene is principally laid in England, and she holds the first place in all reforms and progress. France and Ireland are the last of European peoples to be emancipated from old traditions. America is represented as being behind the European standard in the general education, and sentiment of her people. The story merely serves as a thread on which to string the ideas enunciated, but it has sufficient interest to keep alive the attention, and it is, perhaps, as consistent and probable as the nature of the undertaking admits. Christmas Carol, the hero, is represented as so exceptional a human being that some incongruity is felt in the different scenes in which he has part. A. H.

The Philosophy of Education; or, Pedagogics as a System. By Dr. Karl Rosenkranz, Professor of Philosophy in the University of Königsberg. Translated from the German by Miss Anna C. Brackett.

Miss Brackett has done a valuable service in giving to us, in available form for general reading, one of those works on the science or philosophy of education which are so characteristic of the German culture, and which are claimed to have done so much in securing a higher perfection for the German, than for any other schools.

The general reader will perhaps be somewhat appalled by the dry and speculative tone of the book, very rarely relieved by any illustration from experience of life. It is in the same vein of thought that belongs to the school of speculative philosophy which has developed so remarkably in St. Louis, and which is having so marked an influence on education there, through the influence of Mr. Wm. T. Harris, the Superintendent of Schools, and many of his fellow-laborers.

But however abstract and metaphysical these doctrines may appear, it is certainly worth while for practical educators to study them, finding as we do the best actual results in the schools under the direction of these speculative philosophers.

For instance, in St. Louis, not only is natural science taught in all the schools, one hour in a day being given to it, but the health and comfort of the children are better cared for than in any schools I have ever seen. The ventilation is remarkably good—in all the new schoolhouses—as good as can be obtained in a full room; and no schoolhouse is more than two stories high, thus preventing the passing of foul air from story to story, and the weary climbing of many stairs.

This book treats briefly and concisely of education in its various relations to the family, the State, and society; and we will quote one or two of its most suggestive paragraphs on topics in which the readers of The Index are specially interested:—

"In so far as religion exists in the form of a church, those who are members of the same church may have instruction given on the nature of religion among themselves. Instruction on the subject is proper, and it is even enjoined upon them as a law, as a duty. But further than their own society they may not extend their rule. The church may exert itself to make a religious spirit felt in the school, and to make it penetrate all the teaching; but it may not presume, because it has for its subject the absolute interest of men, the interest which is superior to all others, to determine also the other objects of education or the method of treating them. The technical acquisitions of Reading, Writing, and Arithmetic, Drawing and Music, the Natural Sciences, Mathematics, Logic, Anthropology and Psychology, the practical Sciences of Finance, and the Municipal Regulations, have no direct relation to religion. If we attempt to establish one, there inevitably appears in them a morbid state which destroys them. Not only so, but piety itself disappears, for these accomplishments and this knowledge are not included in its idea."

Again, among other good things, in the chapter on Religious Culture, the author says: "Education has to fit man for religion. . . . Not unfrequently, however, we find that what is meant by religion is theology, or the church ceremonials, and these are only one-sided phases of the total religious process. The Anglican High Church presents in the colleges and universities of England a sad example of this error. What can be more deadening to the spirit, more foreign to religion, than the morning and evening prayers as they are carried on at Oxford and Cambridge, with machine-like regularity."

We commend this work to the careful perusal of all interested in the great subject of education.

GOD IN THE CONSTITUTIONS.

Editor of The Index:—

Thanks for permitting my hasty word from and about Salem. Since Mr. Vickers has condescended to the Librarianship of the Cincinnati Public Library (an important position, for which he is adapted in admirable degree), I am afraid my nearest neighbor is Mr. Charles Burleigh, of Bloomington, Ill., formerly of the Free Congregational Society in Florence, Mass. I had a pleasant letter from him yesterday, parts of which he might most appropriately have sent to The Index. The Bloomington society is not widely known, but is exerting a most healthy influence in Central Illinois.

But just now, my eye is, or has been, turned eastward into Pennsylvania. Has any one sent you a copy of its new Constitution, ratified on Tuesday last by, I am told, more than a hundred and fifty thousand majority?

I think you will find sufficient in the Preamble, and in the fourth section of Article First, for an editorial column; and I shall be glad to see your views upon them. They read as follows:—

PREAMBLE.

We, the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, grateful to Almighty God for the blessings of civil and religious liberty, and humbly invoking His guidance, do ordain and establish this Constitution.

ARTICLE I.

DECLARATION OF RIGHTS.

That the general, great, and essential principles of liberty and free government may be recognized and unalterably established, we declare that—

Section 1. All men are born equally free and independent, and have certain inherent and indefeasible rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, or acquiring, possessing, and protecting property and reputation, and of pursuing their own happiness.

Sec. 2. All power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness. For the advancement of these ends, they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their government in such manner as they may think proper.

Sec. 3. All men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences; no man can of right be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent; no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience, and no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious establishments or modes of worship.

Sec. 4. No person who acknowledges the being of a God and a future state of rewards and punishments shall, on account of his religious sentiments, be disqualified to hold any office or place of trust or profit under this Commonwealth.

Sec. 5. Elections shall be free and equal; and no power, civil or military, shall at any time interfere to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage.

In the Preamble are the finger prints of the leaders of the God in the Federal Constitution Society. It is thus those Jesuits are working, day and night, constant as gravitation, and always and everywhere, with wondrous success. A Convention is now in session in this State, to revise its Constitution; and no stone on earth, nor under the earth, will go unmoved to put into it preamble and provisos similar to those just adopted in Pennsylvania.

The Pennsylvania Constitution is also of most pronounced masculine gender; as witness its Article on Suffrage thus:—

ARTICLE VIII.

SUFFRAGE AND ELECTIONS.

Section 1. Every male citizen twenty-one years of age, possessing the following qualifications, shall be entitled to vote at all elections:—

First. He shall have been a citizen of the United States at least one month.

Second. He shall have resided in the State one year (or if, having previously been a qualified elector or native born citizen of the State, he shall have removed therefrom and returned, then six months) immediately preceding the election.

Third. He shall have resided in the election district where he shall offer to vote at least two months immediately preceding the election.

Fourth. If twenty-two years of age or upwards, he shall have paid within two years a State or County tax, which shall have been assessed at least two months and paid at least one month before the election.

Last Sunday, at the close of lecture, we set our Petitions in motion to Congress, and also to the Ohio State Constitutional Convention, on the Taxation of Church Property, and nearly the whole congregation signed them; and some, not generally with us, but attracted that day by notice that such taxation would be, in part, the theme of discourse. We have procured the printing of some of those Petitions, and shall distribute them in towns and counties round about. But my story grows too long.

IMMORAL ADVERTISEMENTS.

Editor Index:—

The thoughts that first suggested themselves to me, on noticing the advertisement of Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly in your columns, were just those expressed in Mr. Kelsey's communication, which you print to-day. But whilst entertaining no more sympathy with Mrs. Woodhull's aim than Mr. Kelsey or yourself, a little reflection convinced me that you were not merely justified, but required, by the principles of free and fair play which you profess, to insert it.

All reforms, of whatever kind, are not merely for the most part unpopular, but are usually met with the imputation of immorality, or at least illegality. To quote, as an instance, from James Freeman Clarke's speech at the recent centennial celebration in Faneuil Hall, as reported in the newspapers:—

"Why do we celebrate it (the tea spilling in Boston harbor)? It was an illegal proceeding. It was breaking the law. It was plainly a riot. It was an offence against order. Yes. But it was breaking the lower law, and obedience to the higher law."

The same argument was used by those abolitionists who assisted the fugitive slaves in their flight from bondage. And the same argument Mrs. Woodhull has a perfect right to use. For is it not the case that every well-assorted, loving, moral man and wife could safely trust themselves, and be trusted by the community, to live as lovingly and faithfully under the régime of free love as under the present law? And have we any right to suppose, or can any cause be shown, why it is more probable that a wide immorality would follow the promulgation of free love legislation than, as was prophesied (but falsely prophesied, as the result proves), that the emancipation of the slaves would result in the murder and pillage of all the whites in the South?

I have lived through several radical revolutions in politics and social economies, which their opponents always prophesied would result in the dissolution of the social fabric, but which, in fact, produce changes so slowly that they escape the notice of the careless many.

All this, while it does not incline me to pronounce free love expedient at present, prevents me, in ignorance of Mrs. W.'s personal character, from stigmatizing her reform as Mr. Kelsey does.

LETTER TO MR. VOYSEY.

Dear Sir:—

In your letter of November 29, 1873, you manifest once more your noble spirit of cosmopolitanism and charity. But you say: "Let us, then, welcome the Jew, the enlightened, emancipated Jew, as one who will bring to a desperate and determined minority that timely support which may help to lift the dark clouds of atheism, and to bring the sunshine of true faith and hope into the hearts which are well-nigh frozen among the icebergs of materialism."

Allow me to relate my own experience. I was brought up a Lutheran Protestant, and I did believe in the God of the churches and his favored family, until I was compelled by my reason to disbelieve that, a dark dream of my youth. Matter and its inherent forces became superior and more satisfactory to my mind than the theological scarecrow of the Church. I became a confirmed atheist; but I had all the God I needed, the forces of Nature being my Deity. Although I could not define them precisely, I had enough left to think about and hope for: I believed as far as my thinking faculty went, and it found its limit in matter. I could not help it!

With the conviction that there was no such God as I had been taught to believe in, and no hereafter, I was contented; yes, even to the moments which I thought to be the last of my existence. In 1856, I contracted typhoid fever, and had symptoms which are considered fatal by medical men. During my eleven years' study and practice of medicine, I never had seen a patient recover who had such symptoms: therefore I had a cause to think that I should die. But, my dear and noble pioneer in the promotion of universal liberty, I can assure you that it would have brought forth a happy smile, if somebody had told me, or I had seen it in print, that I was in "dark clouds" or "among icebergs."

After my recovery, I kept on reasoning; and my mind's and heart's content now is the existence of a higher and better than the finite human mind. Men love, but there is a higher, a better love; men have wisdom, but there is a higher wisdom, to which we all aspire. Say "He" or "It," there are no hairs to split; but I believe! Among all the rest I include the atheistic brethren; and if I should intimate that the atheists were in "dark clouds." or the materialists "among icebergs," I should consider myself under the same mistake as the Revivalist who said: "The Unitarian prayer is so cold that it will freeze hell over for the Universalists to slide on." Our illustrious Theodore Parker said the right thing at the atheist's funeral, when he prayed: "O God, though our friend doubted thy existence, yet he kept thy laws."

Now, my more able fellow-laborers for the abolishment of mind-slavery, let us criticise all those who assume knowledge and authority; but true faith is beyond criticism, however it may be manifested. Let us speak and write of our own; and if we can convince others that our faith attained by reason is better than theirs, they will accept it! You, Prof. Newman, Mr. Darwin, and others, do a noble work in old Britannia; your sharp dissecting knives will examine every fibre of that muscle which has contracted the iron hand of the English Church. That iron hand crosses even God's free ocean, and interferes with free American citizens when they travel in English vessels. Keep on in your great work of analysis; dissolve in oblivion the bad, and keep the good!

Yours sincerely, CARL H. HORSCH.

DOVER, N. H., December 24, 1873.

A NECESSARY BUT DIFFICULT TASK.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

If ever a truth has been plainly stated and the necessity of a reform proved, it was done in Mr. Voysey's letter in a late INDEX, treating of the abuse of words and the necessity of using them only so as to mean what they express. A falsehood can never be made a truth, nor a bad cause good, by endeavoring to make it appear true or better than it really is, by clothing it in well-sounding words or popular phrases; nor can a truth or a good cause lose anything of its real character and value by giving it maliciously bad names; for a rose by any other name will ever smell as sweetly. Yet, though truth and a good cause can never be changed into their counterparts by mere words, and though fanaticism, bigotry, and malice must ever strive in vain to pervert their essential character, much injury might be, and often really is, done to them by their own friends in using ambiguous words concerning them. Thus, when we speak of "Free Religion," we use a word that does not express what even its most devoted adherents and advocates mean by it. The consequence is that it is looked upon (to say the very least) mistrustingly and suspiciously by large numbers who would fondly embrace it, if we would but plainly state that it is—"The endeavor to improve ourselves and others, society and its conditions, as much as this is possible to human agency; and the means by which we strive to realize this worthy object is; the propagation of liberal ideas, all kinds of beneficial reforms, conceived and matured by the best minds, and furthered and made practicable by enlightening and elevating the masses:"—

And if we then gave it a plain name, expressing this and nothing else; no more, no less.

And while this present unhappy name (Free Religion) makes thousands of true-hearted Liberals ask now scoutingly or seriously, "Free Religion! What is it? What its aim? And what its creed and dogmas?" whom all your "explanations" will leave unsatisfied because these free-thinking men can no more unravel the mystery of a "free religion" than they can understand the mystery of a "triune God," a plain name, expressing no more and no less, and nothing else than the real aim and object of what you so mysteriously call "Free Religion," would at once answer all these and similar questions, and quickly dispel all the mistrust and suspicions that now this most unhappy name calls up in the minds of those who are accustomed and able to do their own thinking.

Though perhaps "Free Religionists" are more damagingly guilty in this respect than infidels or spiritualists these, too, share to a considerable degree in this folly, and so, of course, they also have to suffer the consequences.

Wherefore divide Liberals by such little shibboleths? Have they not opponents enough that they must oppose each other as "Free Religionists," "Infidels," "Spiritualists," and so forth, while in fact all true and advanced Liberals are at once all these to some extent?

Whatever their name may be, each will accept more or less of the other's views and aspirations, so long as he can disclaim the name. 'Tis the name, the dividing shibboleth, that works the mischief. So, when the editor of the Truth Seeker declared with genuine liberality, in his first number: "We embrace as in one brotherhood Liberals, Free Religionists, Rationalists, Spiritualists, Universalists, Unitarians, Friends, Infidels, Free Thinkers," etc., there came in the next number an intolerant Infidel (!), H. Wittstein, and protested against this broad and liberal platform, and against making "common cause" with Spiritualists, because "Spiritualism is superstition." Now you know well enough that I am no Spiritualist, yet I am willing to accept what to me seems good, but also to reject what to me seems false in Spiritualism; most willing, however, am I to give Spiritualism the credit (and it is not small) that is due it as a fearless iconoclast of superstition, whatever its own share of it may be, and a promoter of Free Thought. In an article entitled "A Serious Mistake," I showed the error of this correspondent claiming equity for, and acceptance of, all Liberals of all stripes, and encouraging the editor to persevere in his wise course as the only right one. But here comes in the last number a Spiritualistic correspondent, D. P. Walling, who claims as unwisely all the credit for Spiritualists, and allows scarcely any to Infidels.

What follies! It is neither the Infidel nor Spiritualist, neither the Radical nor Free Religionist alone, that can do the great work for all; but it is the Liberals of all kinds, united into one great army of coworkers, that must and will do it. They alone can do it, when harmoniously united; but they all must inglorious fail when suicidally divided into small sects by petty shibboleths and pernicious prejudices.

Then let us all have our own views, but generous zeal for our common cause; our own ideas, but equal willingness to serve humanity; our own thoughts, but one aim, one cause. Let each class of Liberals strive to promote the grand cause of Liberalism; let us avoid all petty jealousies and pernicious divisions; let us unanimously aim at the right, and, when sure we are right, unite our efforts to accomplish it. Let us not forget that it is not enough to be right; we must also be true; our words must be the true representatives of our meaning, our ideas, our aims, and aspirations.

Yours for the right and the true,

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

TITUSVILLE, Pa., Dec. 11, 1873.

[We sympathize most thoroughly with Mr. Einstein's desire to unite all free minds in the common cause of freedom, which still has vitally important practical work to do. But it is impossible to select any name whatever over which wranglers will not wrangle. So long as words must be used, they will inevitably be understood in different senses; and it is impossible to avoid this. If people would only try to understand each other, and not persistently disregard the definitions given to names by those who use them, the worst mischief would be obviated. The general cöoperation desired must be achieved rather by intelligence and mutual charity than by the disuse of all names, which is impracticable. We have no attachment to any name; but we cannot help using some name, if we speak at all. "Free Religion" was first adopted to avoid narrowness; and if we should use only the name "Liberalism," that would soon fare as badly as the other. If all will but unite on principles, the different names will make no trouble.—ED.]

A PLEA FOR "NEO-CHRISTIANITY."

QUINCY, Mass., Oct. 1, 1873.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Will you excuse me for again being so bold as to request of you a hearing for ideas not in accordance with the objects of your paper? In publishing a former article, you showed so much more liberality than our professedly religious papers that one is almost ashamed to consider you less Christian than they are. For one, I should never feel disposed to deny you the Christian name if you did not decline it yourself. By Christianity I understand moral truth; and whoever lives for it I hail as a Christian brother.

May I be so assuming as to say that it seems to me Christianity is one of the "exact sciences"? I highly approve of your statement that religion must be reduced to an exact science, and received no farther than the principles of science will justify. But where is our authority for limiting the term science to material things? Is Geology less apt to err than true Theology? Do not its students widely differ? Is there any subject of knowledge on which all men are agreed? Even Mathematics has a variety of expounders; and some scientific works, considered authoritative many years ago, are now abandoned. A liability to err is the one distinguishing feature of humanity about which there can be no dispute. The wisest of men knew more than others, simply because he knew he was ignorant, while others fancied themselves wise. It is an error to suppose that religious people eschew science in their religious belief. One of the greatest religious writers of France based his opinions entirely upon scientific knowledge. He says, "True philosophy is distinguished from physical science only by the nature of the phenomena it observes. The peculiar phenomena of physical science are those of external Nature; the peculiar phenomena of philosophy are those of that other world which every man bears within himself."

Can I not be as conscious of the existence of pain, of love, or of hate, as I am of the stars, or of rocks? Why, then, should a knowledge of one be considered unscientific, and knowledge of the other true science? Cannot mental phenomena be as skillfully classified as outward manifestations of creative power? If you succeed in correctly classifying human emotions, your work is of God fully as much as Newton's in arranging celestial knowledge, and that of Agassiz in classifying animate nature. Do not be deterred from a rigid application of scientific rules to religious emotions. It will do us all good in the end, however much we may wince at the application of the intellectual scalpel. For one, I do not wish to believe in anything contrary to reason, no matter where it is taught. No true Christian will ever ask this of another. If my religion will not stand the test of rigid criticism, then give me one that will. I will not knowingly believe a doctrine that is not surrounded with proof, like a head crowned with stars.

It is said of some that "they have eyes, but see not; ears, but do not hear." Precisely so, it seems to me, is it with those who gaze so earnestly upon the world outside of them, and forget that much nearer one within them. Like the ancient Jews, they look exclusively to an outward kingdom, when a far greater one is "within them." I do not pretend to be an expounder of spiritual laws, by any means. Before that vast universe within me, I can only cover my face and say, "Holy, holy is the Lord Almighty." But I can no more doubt the existence of that spiritual world than I can that of the terrestrial one. Indeed, it is more real than that one, because my soul is much more cognizant of its existence. I may not be able to see and hear the material world, but I am always present with the spiritual one. Certainly I must know more of the me than of the not-me.

Now I wish briefly to allude to three spiritual facts, not because they are all or by any means the principal facts of our spiritual nature, but merely to serve as samples of the multitude of facts with which our spiritual nature is swarming. I allude to our sense of helplessness, to our consciousness of acquired strength, and to the delight of exercising this strength.

Did you ever hear of a human being who did not sometimes cry out, "Help, help"? Did you not do it when poring over the mysteries of the forty-seventh proposition in Euclid, if not before? Did you not do it when gazing upon the vast firmament of stars? Never call for help to love your bitterest enemy? Always able to be placid amid the greatest turmoil? Now it is my opinion that never did that man tread this earth who did not feel the need of aid in the glorious work of "perfecting his nature" which I think you define to be religion, and which I heard given as the definition of religion at the last Free Religious Convention in Boston. Here, then, is a scientific fact; viz., the helplessness of man. Christianity is based upon this fact.

Then whoever cried for help and did not receive it, provided his cry was sincere? Does the cry of your child startle you from a sound slumber, and induce you of a cold winter's night to spring to its release? Does God love his children any less? The heathen calls upon Buddha, Juggernaut, or Jupiter, and receives help. It matters not to whom I address my cry for power to do right. Attendant angels waft my low wail to the benevolent ear of my Father, and my prayer is answered. It would be the same if I prayed to the ocean, to a tree, or to a rock. Our dear parent is not a jealous God, and I do not think is at all angry with even the worshippers of the sun. He hears prayer, no matter to whom offered. We do get help when we call for it. Did not Mr. Parker always delight in imparting light to his ignorant visitors? And shall God be any less benevolent?

The third fact is, the joy in doing what we are thus enabled to do. Call it by what term you please, it is a fixed fact that, of all the joys the human soul is capable of, the greatest is that of being able to accomplish a coveted but difficult task. This joy Christianity abounds in describing, calling it "being filled with the Holy Ghost." First it says, you can't of yourself; secondly, you can with God; thirdly, obedience will make you happy. All believers in religion, the world over, agree in the statement that, when God helped them, they loved everybody. You may go to a thousand persons scattered all over the world, and receive from each of them an account of his religious experience, and every one of them will tell you that the principal feature in this new creation was love.

"On the wings of his love
I was carried above."

John Wesley once doubted what afterwards became one of his cardinal doctrines. He examined separately six hundred persons, and each one invariably testified to the same disputed point. Was there no science in this? But I am trespassing too much upon your limited space. If you have no room for this at present, keep it until you have some unoccupied corner. I do sincerely desire that our free religious friends may not throw away the precious ore of truth, because it is surrounded with such a mass of impure metal. I do not wonder at the rejection of Christianity by multitudes of pure-minded men; but if they would only believe with Theodore Parker that Christianity was "absolute religion," dating as far back as the Garden of Eden, and not a mere system of barren beliefs and meaningless forms, they would be able to respect Jesus more than they are now able. I do not understand that Jesus propounded new truths to the race, but only sought to uncover to man the glorious metal of truth that had been for ages hidden from his sight beneath the foul accumulations of countless forms of error.

Yours for true Christianity,

C. STEARNS.

HOW TO MEASURE THEIR MISERY.

WORCESTER, Nov. 11, 1873.

MR. EDITOR:—

I have just been re-reading an article in the Independent, to assure myself that the writer (President Charles G. Finny, of Oberlin) did not write it in fun. The article is headed "What Does It Mean?" I will guess it was written seriously, at the risk of being laughed at by him for doing so.

His object is to spur up the clergy, who profess to believe in an endless hell, to greater faithfulness in preaching the same. To do this, he goes into a calculation of the amount of suffering even the most ordinary sinner will have to undergo, says there will come a time in the experience of the mildest sinner when he can say, "I have suffered more than the whole universe of creatures had suffered before I began to be!". That is putting the case pretty strongly, but he says God deplores the necessity of inflicting all this suffering. But, if one is going into that line, why not state the case still more strongly, and declare that the time will come in the experience of the sinner, when he can say he has suffered more than the whole universe of creatures will have suffered at any given point of time, any number of trillions of years in the future? Then there is the endless enlargement of capacity for suffering, which he can assume and we will grant; so the time must come in the experience of said "mild sinner," when he will suffer more in five minutes (the next writer can put less!) than the whole universe of beings had suffered prior to his existence.

These interesting speculations might be carried on ad infinitum with little danger of bringing about the millennium prematurely; so far as bettering the moral character is concerned, they would, I should say, be about as useful as—well, say collecting postage-stamps.

Advertisements.

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12		Insertions,	10c	per	line.

" 26 "	51	"	6	"	"

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

At the last meeting of the Directors of the Index Association, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

"Resolved, That Asa K. Butts has violated the essential condition of his advertising contract with the Index Association, and thereby annulled his said contract, and lost all right to renew the same.

"Resolved, That this Board deem it inexpedient to renew said contract for advertising with said Butts, or to make any similar contract with him; and the editor is instructed to carry this resolution into immediate effect."

In obedience, therefore, to these resolutions of the Directors, is now given that Mr. Butts cannot execute any contracts he may have made with third parties for the insertion of advertisements in THE INDEX. But, in order to prevent all embarrassment or loss to such advertisers, they are requested to correspond without delay directly with THE INDEX Office, stating the terms formerly agreed on; and new arrangements can undoubtedly be made to the entire satisfaction of the advertisers.

NOTICE

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

BAGEHOT on the English Constitution. The English Constitution. By Walter Bagehot. New and revised edition, crown 8vo., cloth..... 2.25 18

This edition contains a new and interesting introduction, giving the author's impressions as to the visible and probable results of the changes wrought in the English Constitution by the legislation which has taken place since 1867, the year in which the first edition appeared. The introduction, filling 67 pages, is followed by the nine chapters of the original work, treating upon the Cabinet, the Monarchy, the House of Lords, the House of Commons, on Changes of Ministry, its Supposed Checks and Balances, the Prerequisites of Cabinet Government and the Peculiar Form which they have Assumed in England, its History and the effects of that History.

BANCROFT'S History of the United States, from the Discovery of the American continent. By George Bancroft. With Portraits, Maps, &c. Tenth (and last) volume in preparation. Vols. VII., VIII., and IX. are also published as Vols. I., II., and III. of the American Revolution, with title pages and binding to correspond. Vols. I. to IX. 8vo ..... 22.50 ex

The unequalled facilities possessed by Mr. Bancroft in the preparation of these volumes, and the many years of labor and research which he has bestowed upon them, together with the admirable and attractive style in which they are written, have caused this great work to be universally regarded, both in Europe and America, as the best history of this country yet produced, and as a standard authority.

"Among the Historians who have attained a high and deserved reputation in the United States within the last few years, we are inclined to yield the first place to George Bancroft. His experience in political and diplomatic life, no less than his rare and generous culture, and his singular union of the highest mental faculties, enable us to predict with confidence that his work will be reckoned among the genuine masterpieces of historical genius."—Westminster Review.

SCOTT'S WAVERLEY NOVELS. The Waverley Novels. By Sir Walter Scott, Bart. Centenary Edition. Illustrated with Vignettes and Frontispieces. This attractive edition of the Waverley Novels was published in commemoration of the hundreth anniversary of Sir Walter Scott's birthday. It claims to be the only complete edition, containing the author's manuscript notes and corrections: the works have been carefully compared with Scott's inter-leaved copy, and from this source annotations of considerable interest have been obtained, which have not before been published. Some minor notes of an explanatory kind have been introduced, while a special Glossary has been added to such of the Novels as require it, and each volume contains a separate index. It is printed in very clear and legible type (especially cast for the purpose) upon white wove paper, of superior quality; is well bound in maroon cloth, extra, and handy in size. 25 vols. BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX, and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent, that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality.

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also, that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——; Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

WHICH IS BETTER, to be committed to "pure Christianity" (as the Register says the Unitarian denomination is) or to "pure religion"? St. James speaks well of the last, but he says nothing about the first.

"ATHEISM is a bloody and ferocious system," says Rev. Robert Hall. The atheist, if he chose, might fairly retort on Christianity with the same charge, so far as it is an instituted and historical system of religion.

THOSE OF THE INDEX subscribers who, in renewing their own subscriptions, are also sending new ones, are manifesting their interest in THE INDEX, and the cause it serves, in a most encouraging and efficient way.

"DO NOT FORGET, I entreat you," said Mr. Sumner in his speech at the New England dinner, "that with the highest morality is the highest liberty." True; but we must have liberty before we can have morality.

CONGRESSMAN DAWES states that the pay of the President, including salary and perquisites, amounts to four hundred thousand dollars for a presidential term. This, certainly, is a pecuniary prize worth scrambling for by men who are ambitious in that way.

REV. DR. SEARS is distressed because the German theologian, Dr. Tholuck, "believes that all men and fallen spirits will finally be saved." If Dr. Sears objects to all men being saved, perhaps he might get himself exempted if he would petition in the right quarter.

AN INDEX subscriber, writing from Jacksonville, Illinois, says: "We have a Plato Club here, and John Stuart Mill has some of his most enthusiastic admirers in our town." Success to the Plato Club, and, as Rip Van Winkle would say, "may it live long and prosper!"

THE Christian Statesman, of Dec. 27, contains an essay on "The Rights of God,"—which is a plea for the God-in-the-Constitution amendment. That is a poor God who cannot take care of his own "rights," but needs that man should be constantly legislating to secure them.

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, minister of the Church of the Disciples in this city, never showed his liberality more markedly than when he invited Charles Bradlaugh, the atheist, to visit and address his Sunday-school. Mr. Bradlaugh did it, too, and says he "thoroughly enjoyed" it.

CALIFORNIA, which at one time was considered the most lawless and uncivilized State in the Union, seems now to promise to lead the van in that popular reform whose destiny to sweep through our national politics, from one end of the country to the other, grows plainer every day.

MR. PHILBRICK, superintendent of the Boston public schools, who has lately made a tour of observation abroad, says that, as regards school buildings, libraries, apparatus, and so forth, America is considerably behind her European competitors. In this particular, he says, Sweden takes the lead, and Austria and Germany follow.

WE HAD supposed that the Danbury News was only funny, but Charles Bradlaugh says it is also vicious. He complains that the Boston correspondent of that paper has maligned and abused him. He says: "If ever a prize be offered for lying, it will be useless for any others to try while the Danbury News' correspondent is a competitor."

"TELL US something scarey," said a bright boy in a Sunday-school class, to his teacher. We don't know of anything more "scarey" that the teacher might have gratified this boy with, than the Calvinistic Christian's idea of God and the Devil. The story of these two fabulous beings has frightened the wits out of many a grown-up man and woman, and we should think it might be sufficiently "stunning" to a vigorous boy.

A GOOD SUGGESTION is made in the New York Tribune, by an undergraduate of Princeton, that there should be a series of inter-collegiate contests in scholarship, essay writing, and oratory,—as there already is in boating and ball-playing. Excellent! Let the bookmen to the platform, as the boatmen to the water, and the ballmen to the field! Let us have a generous rivalry, among college boys, of brains as well as of muscle, a prize competition of wits as well as of bat and oar!

IN THE Unitarian Church in Sherburne, Mass., the officiating clergyman, on a recent Communion Sunday, somewhat startled the congregation by declining to pass the wine. He was willing to commemorate the worthy by eating bread, but on conscientious grounds he was not willing to drink, or ask others to drink, intoxicating liquors, even "for Christ's sake." We understand that, by so doing, he fatally damaged his chances for a "call" to that Parish! The Unitarians have a great reverence for "pure Christianity," but some of them would seem to have little for pure conscientiousness.

MISS JENNIE COLLINS, superintendent of the establishment known as "Boffin's Bower," in this city, would appear to be doing a thoroughly wise and excellent work for girls and young women, especially those belonging to the unemployed class. She has been able to furnish temporary employment and permanent situations to thousands who needed but were not able otherwise to obtain one or the other. Long life and success to "Boffin's Bower," and to Miss Collins! They are evidently doing a greater service in securing woman's right to labor, and to have a "career," than any more theoretical enterprise looking to the same end.

IN HIS BOOK on the English Gipsies and their Language, Mr. Leland says: "Be it for good or for evil, the real gipsy has, unlike all other men, unlike the lowest savage, positively no religion, no tie to a spiritual world, no fear of a future; nothing but a few trifling superstitions and legends which, in themselves, indicate no faith whatever in anything deeply sacred." We confess we do not yield an undoubting assent to this statement, positive as it is. The few "trifling superstitions and legends" of the gipsy may have a far deeper meaning than Mr. Leland is able to discover; and, if so, they may constitute the gipsy's "religion." At any rate, we do not believe the gipsy even is wholly without his dreams, his visions, of something higher, truer, and nobler than what he realizes; and if he has these dreams and visions, then these are his "religion."

THE BOSTON Journal, of Dec. 27, discusses the question of "The Increase of Crime." It concludes that crime is increasing faster than the population, and says that Boston is getting a bad name in the criminal record of cities. The Journal suggests no remedy for all this, but calls upon the new city government to consider the matter and provide some means for meeting the exigency. The whole subject of the organization of society, and the nature, construction, and function of government, needs thorough and able discussion, and the best minds of our day ought to be employed in it. The question of more or less government, and whether the State should be protective or prescriptive, or both, is an exceedingly important one. Shall human nature be trusted or feared; shall we put our faith in liberty and education, or in restraint and compulsion?—these are interrogations that meet the thoughtful mind at every step, and which we cannot but consider with more and more seriousness. Let the free parliament of the noblest intellects and purest hearts be summoned, and sit in constant session to deliberate upon the true civilization of man!

"Radical" Piety.

BY WILLIAM C. GANNETT.

"I am not pious," I heard that a friend had said; and it made me wonder, What, then, is piety? "I do not like prayers and hymns in public church," said a second friend, and the same question thus came up from another side.

PIETY—THE COMMON FEELINGS EXPANDED AND EXALTED.

What, then, is piety? It is simply religious feeling. And what are religious feelings? The common feelings,—fear, reverence, gratitude, trust, aspiration, peace, joy, love; but these feelings not closing now about a child, or a husband, or a wife, or saints, or the grand human nature, nor about the mountains, or the ocean, or the sky, or flowers, and the grand face of outward Nature,—but closing about the thought of Him who is the One in all these things. Perhaps Love best sums them all up, and God best names that One. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," said old Jewish books, and Jesus called that the first and great commandment. And my friend said she was not pious.

I know she felt these feelings towards those separate beings; that she reverenced her father, and loved children and her mother dearly. She knew it, too. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,"—that she was trying to do. She felt poems, was fascinated by flowers, I think, was grateful for many things, tried to be good, was quiet-hearted, glad-hearted usually, seemed to trust that to-morrow would be good like to-day. But loving God, thankful to Him, trusting Him,—what was that? She said she was not pious.

Was she not, however, without knowing it? Yes and no. It would probably take both words to make a true answer. No; for I doubt if either by thought or by pain she had ever yet found her way to the deeper places of herself, where these feelings are most apt to gather and greaten till they become consciously religious. Yes; for there is a great deal of dimly conscious piety which its owners do not recognize. Indeed, we all are but dimly conscious of what we feel in this direction. Piety is not a new kind of feeling. It is a great mistake to suppose that. We do not live twenty years, and then have a stranger visit us when we "experience religion." Reverence, trust, love, felt for anybody, anything, are the same feelings, which, being felt for God, become "religious." There is not one kind of trust in a good man and another kind in a good God. The feeling is called forth by the goodness, and is the same in kind, however large and perfect the goodness be. The old Greeks were right,—they used this one word "piety" for the reverence due to parents and for that due to the gods; and we still talk, although now it sounds a little quaintly, of "filial piety." No; all these human-loves and Nature-loves are the very germs that grew and blossom into that vaster love which by-and-by is willing to say of itself, which has to say of itself, No human name fits this feeling,—it is not father or mother or child or husband-love, not neighbor-love, nor Nature-love, but it seems to hold all these, and be all these, and yet far more, it is the love for God! So that all, all have the germs of religiousness in them, just because they are human beings and feel human affections, and not one but has it in his nature to love God, and know that it is love for Him. Whoever loves his mother is on his way to the love of God.

FULL HUMAN STATURE MUST HAVE IT.

Still my two friends might say, perhaps, that although it may thus exist in germ, and at moments come to consciousness in them, yet—they cannot help it, but—they have very little feeling towards things they cannot see. If you remind them of patriotism, and ask them if they can see the Country which they love,—of duty, and ask if the thought of it, apart from all doers of it, does not sometimes make them thrill, they would own they can look at things they do not see; and yet would frankly insist on their confession that for the grandest, highest things, for Him who is the One Life and Love in all things, their feeling is but very faint. Perhaps half-sadly, perhaps half-mockingly, they would insist on it. And many would agree with them. "Piety" has a bad name. Religion (most men will assent) is good. But religious feeling,—it is a poor sort of sentimentality, it leads to all the ridiculous excesses and absurdities. Very bad men often have it, the coarsest have it vehemently. Rational religion is cool, well-regulated, self-controlled. Better ideas diminish feeling. We do not like the thing, we do not like the name. So say many with a no-shake of the head.

I doubt all this. Expression of it varies, as expression of all feeling varies with culture. Loudness diminishes. It goes from voice to the music of one's manner. It goes from outward rites of worship to moral loyalty in living. But is this diminution or increase of the feeling? Better ideas lessen feeling! Can that be? Can ideas grow grander on our vision and the feeling of grandeur fade in our hearts? Can feeling fade at all as one gains fuller stature of manhood or womanhood? Why, it is one of the three great forces of human nature. It seems to make connection between mind and will, between thought and action, everywhere in life. We do nothing important without it. There is an inward correlation, as it were,—a transformation always going on, by which idea or belief turns to feeling, feeling turns to will. Emotion might be called reason-in-motion. It is the form in which the driving force everywhere applies itself, the heat in the form of the steam, as it were. And these three elements together enter into what we call religion because they enter into all kinds of living. Religion is simply the highest kind. How then can one escape religious feeling and be a whole human being? How can ideas be grand and action be earnest, with no deep, strong feeling lying between? No, again No,—the larger we grow, the more you and I must have of what is meant by piety. We cannot lose it from our being if we would.

ITS TWO EXPRESSIONS: I. DUTY.

Drop the metaphysics and think what splendors of duty this piety, at which we shake our heads, has wrought upon the earth in coming to expression. It is the enthusiastic love or gratitude or trust which springs from some belief about God that sends men to do their best work, and bear their hardest cross, and pray their prayers of desperation out into victories of action. Instead of some little belief, "piety" applies the driving power of the greatest belief possible to a man's will, and lo! the feeble man is a giant, and the quiet woman an indomitable resister, and the little handful of a people goes forth to conquer nations. Religious enthusiasts are the real kings in history, and religious enthusiasms the forces that move masses. "It is the will of God," was the cry that broke from the lips of the Clermont Council and hurried Europe to the first Crusade. "Trust in God and keep your powder dry," was Cromwell's battle-order, and the trust accounts for more than the powder. We are no Calvinists, but it was by Calvinistic inspirations that men founded the Dutch Republic, the English Commonwealth, and Puritan New England. Great woes also have been wrought at the bidding of religion. It is trite blame to curse it—to curse Christianity, for instance,—for manifold crimes, and trite praise thus to credit it with having prompted and carried through most of the hard things that have been done by people or by persons. Of course religion shows men thus at their best, and of course also it shows them at their worst; for not at all does it create the standard of morality, it simply puts the common conscience of a man or an age into most energetic action. So men who will hate, or lie, or kill, will lie, and hate, and kill, more appallingly in a religious than in any other cause. And men who are ready to die for the good of others will die rapturously when some mighty religious belief floods their motive with its enthusiasm. There were Jesus, Paul, John Brown. And can you and I spare ourselves this force that stirs the men and women to so much of their higher heroism?

II. WORSHIP.

Think again what marvels piety has wrought when pressing forth in its other and simpler way of mere worship. It has studded the earth with temples, and made the sun to rise everywhere to the sound of a rolling tide of prayer. It has set apart priests, and dressed altars, and led up sacrifices; it has bent the knees of the race from its young savage day till now, and opened its lips in songs. It has written psalms, and collected the dropped prayers and prophecies and poems together in the Bibles of the nations. It has invented the names Jehovah, Father, Shepherd, King, for God, and called Him Our Rock, Our Tower, Our Shield, Our Sun, Our Very Present Help. Worship probably gave birth to all forms of human art, our sculpture, our music, our architecture, our painting, our poems.

The tendency of expression is ever from the outward to the inward, as was hinted; from the special to the pervading; from the robe and gesture to the thought of the heart and the fineness of one's duty; and only through long ancestries of fantastic attitude and cruel rite have our simple forms of worship come down to us. There is the danger of parading feeling, and therefore with that second friend I spoke of—he who disliked hymns and prayers in public church,—the dislike may be a sign of the depth and strength of his religious feeling. The village infidel, the family sceptic, is sometimes the one most interested in religion,—interested enough to grimly deny the false, unnatural views around him. We all dislike some prayers, and one wonders at the hymn-books which survive in some churches. And Jesus' own word was,—"Go to thy closet for thy prayer." But, on the other hand, if one lives habitually in Jesus' state of thought and feeling, I should think prayer, or at least words about the Father very like to spoken prayer, would be natural and seem natural at many times and places,—as they were with him; and that the presence of others or the regularity of the time might not quench the feeling, but even come to quicken it. The children never think their father's love is formal because he gives them a regular evening frolic, or because he sometimes kisses them in the street. That home is cold where something of this kind is not so common as to seem regular, more natural than anything else, not making or seeking, but taking all occasions without thought.

DARE TO EXPRESS IT.

There is a danger certainly in both directions,—a danger of parading feeling, but a danger, also, which radicals are apt to overlook, of repressing it. It may be more of an artificial ceremony to be silent than to speak. "The coming man" may not go to church. If you are the coming man, you can decide. Perhaps he will do things which we cannot do so easily, make music, write poems, in common conversation speak the prayer-mood from mind to mind; somehow surely he will find means to utter in forms of grace and beauty the deepening feelings of adoration, these feelings which move him most and ache for beautiful expression. I do not doubt the coming men and women will be silent on many subjects where we are wont to chat. I do doubt if "God" be one of them.

Meanwhile it is folly and unnoble to be indignant at old excesses of worship or at any seen around us now. These also come from human nature working in sincerity.

Better, by all means, better give up for ourselves the word or custom which seems untrue, which palls, which long fails to utter what is simply at our heart. But if we are conscious of religious feeling, let us not, in our revulsion from any of its poor expressions, disown it or try to quench it! If ever we remember single moments even, by death-beds perhaps, under night skies, before the miracles of spring, listening to music, and specially in the upliftings which great words and heroic deeds sometimes give, moments in the unutterable shames of sin or the unutterable sweetness of love, when the feelings rose, descended—you know not which—till you seemed to be conscious of union with All-Mightiness and All-Goodness,—then, for the sake of those moments and what they have meant in our lives, let us not disown that which is called by the name piety!

It has the bad name, I grant. We pronounce it piety! and wince under it, and hardly want to claim it, and rather dread to have its reputation put upon us. But for two reasons it bears so bad a name: because it is so deep in human nature that of course it takes gross forms, for the savage has it and the ruffian to some extent; and because it is so good to have that men turn hypocrites to wear its likeness. We don't pretend to be things bad, but something good. Hypocrisy is the devil's homage to virtue. The noblest thing will be most often travestied. George Washington and the Virgin Mary have had a great many more babies named after them than you or I will have. And therefore piety—because it is a blossom-name for all growing men and women, because it is a word of coronation, because (not by Jewish law's authority or Jesus' affidavit but) by the very constitution of our nature, it is the first and last and great commandment to love God in order that we may grow into his likeness,—therefore it has so often been put on falsely and has used so many formal, outward ways to express and emphasize itself. It means, remember, reverence and trust and love directed to the Highest. It means the clearest, strongest of enthusiasms. "Enthusiasm"—who does not want that? It is simply the word piety spelt long and sounding nobly. If the common etymology be true, it carries grandeur in its very syllables; it is said to come from two Greek words, within and God, and to mean the sense of being within God or having God in us. It is almost too large a claim to make, to claim that one feels "enthusiasm;" but one can, and if he can, he ought to make it. Not in the spirit of pride, but of confession, of allegiance, of an honesty so true that it will not hesitate to own that which shames him most to own. One cannot say a more humbling thing than to say outright, "I love God,—I rejoice in God,"—not a word that binds him so to hard pureness and exposes him to such danger of hard judgments. But if it is simply owning the loyalty which is due, and which you know you feel, not to own it would be the cowardliness. So, although the words are hard, when one has it, he should be willing to declare that he has feeling that goes outside of home, and town, and the planet, and somehow lays hold of the Universal and Eternal. And this is "enthusiasm,"—this is true piety. Who, who would be without it? Who can be when he is full-grown?

THE ONE BELIEF THAT UNDERLIES ALL PIETY.

Let me ask another question, now, one that will take us into the secret places of this most high enthusiasm. Behind feeling of all kinds lies some idea, some belief, I said a while ago. What is the Great Belief that lies behind all religious feeling and seems to generate it?

Is it not always, in some form, a belief that there is direct connection between the Almightiness and the little me, that the strength of God joins on to our strength? When does man fear God? When he believes that the close Neighbor threatens him. When does one yearn to "see" Him? When we hope for the peace and lifting of His sympathy. When do we love God? When we realize that God is actually loving us. "Yes, for me, for me, He careth," is the cry that sends us into bravery and purity and all obedience. It is as if there were an actual laying hands in the hands of God! When that conviction takes possession of a man, no wonder he can do almost anything. We call him inspired—possessed—and fear him and love him and follow him and do his bidding.

THE MANY FORMS OF THIS BELIEF.

In some form, I say, it is this belief that generates the feeling. It seems to be always one belief in essence, but it takes many differing forms. Make sure of this.

In the old Jewish faith it took a national shape. Out of all the tribes of earth Israel was Jehovah's elect people, preserved by his outstretched arm through centuries of oppression. "I the Lord am thy Savior and thy Redeemer, the Mighty One of Jacob." God seemed near through that idea to them.

In Jesus' mind it took an intenser and more personal shape. Jehovah had meanwhile become the Father-in-Heaven, and he, Jesus, was the elect child, the son of God intrusted with the special Messianic mission; and that Father was more real to him a thousand times than Joseph and Mary. "Wist ye not that I must be about his business?"

In Paul, another Jew but of broader Greek training, we find that the thought which roused enthusiasm was a glorious vision in which the Jewish faith and the Jesus faith were enlarged while being fused together. The elect nation widened to a Universal Church that embraced Jew and Gentile, man and angel, things seen and things not seen; and Jesus, the Christ, had become the First-born Son of God, the Mighty Head of All, "through whom we are of the household of God, children and heirs of God, joint heirs of Christ, and nothing shall separate us from the love of God." In virtue of that vision the Father seemed fatherly to Paul.

And still the vision grew, both elements expanding. Among the Catholics it is the Jewish, the visible church part of the Pauline faith that has chiefly made God real. The Pope on earth as the Christ's vicegerent here, the Virgin-Mother and the saints and priests for handy mediators,—these keep the heavens near and open to their millions: while Protestantism thrills with the other part of the Pauline faith, the idea of the Son of God. Christ's incarnation, the redemption by his blood, the revelation brought by him, the prayer answered for his sake. In these the Friendly Hand has been and still is felt by other Christian millions.

And thus we might go on. The Quakers have their doctrine of the inner light. The Methodists theirs of the new birth. The Mystics their rapt absorption in the divine love. The Universalists their belief that the heavens will finally hold all. The Spiritualists theirs that the fair heavens are always close at hand and that friends pass to and fro.

In all these differing faiths the glow of religious feeling seems to spring out of just that belief in each one which asserts an actual touch of God, the personal connection of men with the Infinite Strength and Infinite Goodness. We see how many many forms the belief may take. All religiousness asserts in some way this fact of communication between the finite and the Infinite: and since in this assertion lies the source of all "enthusiasm," therefore every "religion" can inspire enthusiasm and every one can claim a piety.

Even what is called Radicalism! Then it must have the same great belief, its way of conceiving that fact of communication between God and men.

It is doubted, you know, whether Radicalism is or can be pious. It seems to many a purely intellectual system and false at that. It feels cold, freezing to many. It certainly does cast off many of the wrappings that afford warmth elsewhere. It interprets the universe somewhat newly. The very words God and Providence and Man mean something rather different to it from what is meant by them in the usual faiths of Christendom. And most of those who hold these other faiths cannot conceive how one can be warmed, inspired, uplifted, thrilled by our strange views. This arises from a third common mistake about piety. One mistake is the thought that piety is a new kind of feeling; another, I think, is that revulsion from all prayer and praiseful utterance of feeling. This is the third error, the idea that only one set of religious beliefs can generate it, can generate deep warm religious feeling; and it is held by very many of the Orthodox and apparently by some Unitarians. They do not read. They do not know. They have not travelled. They do not see. These enthusiasms are common to all religions; no one, no two, no twenty, can claim to have peculiar possession. They are stronger in some than in others perhaps,—but of even this it is hard for an outsider to judge.

What is fire to one is water ice-cold to another. It is greatly a question of temperament. It is very greatly again a question of culture. The belief that is going to inspire me must be fitted to my capacity of reception; and people's capacities are unlike both by birth and education. It is somewhat as it is with music and poetry; one likes Pollok's Course of Time and Young's Night Thoughts and Thomson's Seasons, and one likes Longfellow and Whittier, and one likes Browning best. One can only enjoy the simpler strains, and another thrills at the closing of complex harmonies. Just so with the great beliefs cherished by separate sects and religions. Each has some interpretation of the universe which asserts that which to Spinoza, the "God-intoxicated" "atheist," was "the supreme Good, namely, realizing the intimate relation between the individual soul and the universe of things;" but to me your interpretation may be utter error, blind superstition,—to you mine may be utter error, the sum of infidelity. Let us not scoff at that which is Life and Love, that which brings the sense of God to another man. But let us earnestly and mightily assert against all denial that we have the vision too. And let us not even be indignant at the denial. The Coming Faith is always called Atheism by the Faith Present. It is Atheism to it. In a time like ours, when the old religious beliefs are falling to pieces and giving way to new ones, it is perfectly true that piety, religious feeling, does waver and wane for a time; and perfectly natural that men and women should tremblingly cling to the old and warming faiths. It needs a firm conviction to generate and sustain strong feeling of any kind. But when the change in the ideas is accomplished, and the new ones stand clearly up, a positive system of beliefs, another interpretation of the universe, which men may look at and ask questions about and have them answered and watch as it brings about pure living and earnest loving in the corners of the world,—why then, men will see, as they have seen a hundred times before, that the danger was imaginary and that Radicalism adds one more to the list of faiths that can claim an enthusiastic piety; and many will find themselves rejoicing in the better view which, because truer to the grandness of facts, gives, and must give, more than the old warmth and inspiration to the heart.

ITS FORM IN RADICALISM: OUR TWO CHARACTERISTIC BELIEFS.

Every day has its Radicalism to which all this applies. We who bear the name at this day have not lost that sense of personal connection with the Infinite Goodness. Nay, we think that for ourselves, at least, it has deepened by to-day's change in thought.

I should sum up the characteristic belief of Radicalism in two short sentences, which for us in turn carry the meaning of the universe in them:—

(1.) A belief in the ONE IN ALL AND ALL IN ONE,—that is in the actual immanence of God.

(2.) A belief in the EACH IN ALL AND ALL IN EACH,—that is, in the actual kinship of all things in the universe to each other.

"One in All and All in one." Literally, that the presence we call God is not represented, not imparted, but is in each and every thing, so that the great whole is a unity and nothing is or happens but has the Power, the Wisdom, and the Goodness in it. Nothing without the Power! so that there is nothing slight, no trifle anywhere. The Almighty hands are there. The commonplace is the Infinite, and the Infinite is commonplace! He who is shining in the planets will green our hillsides and blossom in the bud upon the tree as well as in the new star-systems of the farther heavens. And an utter reverence for all things rises in us.

Nothing without the Wisdom! All is order everywhere. Kosmos, not chaos. The Omnipresent Force always acting by laws,—nothing eluding, nothing dropped. The Almighty Mind is on it! Chance,—a word that has no meaning. Accident,—impossible. And so a great trust rises up that all things are true and steadfast, that the universe is pledged to an absolute good faith.

Nothing without the Goodness! for we more than dimly recognize that all things are in a process of growth towards higher things, that this great organism with its myriad attunings means an ever deepening harmony, a perfecting of the whole. The Almighty Heart beats everywhere, and the Almighty Conscience watches. So the unswerving laws are known to be divine necessities of mercy, and are greeted as holy beneficence. Every pang, and sacrifice, and tragedy they involve are but the quickening help, and every moment brings the blessedness of fact. That trust rises higher—into love.

And He who is Hands, and Mind, and Heart, and Conscience in All is the one we call our God!

The other article of our creed is, "Each in All and All in Each," that is, that all Nature is actually inter-related, part with every other part, I to them and every one to me. This must be so, if that first faith be true. If there is that One in All whom we name God, then in virtue of that unity all things must be partakers in each other. The Brotherhood of all things in the Universe is but a corollary to the Fatherhood of God.

This fact also we can but spell, and not attain unto the comprehension of its mystery.

All pasts, all futures, centre in the present, and all the present is related unto us. It takes the whole eternity behind, it takes all realms of space to account for us just as we are this day. Each one lives the resultant of an infinite number of infinitesimal pushings. Take this thought and limit it to the limits of history only, and what a sense of brotherhood it rouses, as we remember how all past nations coworked with each other, and moulded better generations, and furnished them with arts, and cultures, and manners, and pushed these growing heir-looms down, to finally place us at our height of inches and our health of blood and our wealth of brain and heart, here, in this land and town, and in these homes, and in this church to-day! And influence from us, and influence from us to-day, will go on and into other beings, and be passed on and outward forever and forever! We are to live, then, so that the ages, could they look back on us and speak, should cry out thanks to us for our Sunday. Realize this,—in the circle of one's nursery, and parlor, and shop, realize the truth, and what a sense of gratitude, of friendliness, and of responsibility to do our part well in the passing month, this thought of "Each in All" inspires!

Or take the thought in a way that may make it seem more real. Think of a spring day. Shall we count that day in blue skies, in soft south winds, in the resurrection of the grass blades on the hills, and the bursting of a myriad buds? All that,—but we, too, are a part of the May, are we not? A real, a living, aye—the most living and the noblest part. My waking is a part of the sunrise! My breakfast greeting is a part of the morning's freshness and gladness! My voice, my thought, my prayer,—is it not a part of the dear Sunday? Does God leave us out of his springtime in latitude forty-two degrees? Does he ever leave us out in working through his planet christened "Earth"? Nay,—grass blade, and singing bird, and humming insect, and the glad children, and the young man and maiden, and old mothers, join with the blowing air, and the far blue, and the marching sun, to make up this that we call the 25th of May. It is all one family. We are a part of the beauty, and it behooves us to be as beautiful and as glad a part at least as the insensate or less sensate things around us.

THE PIETY THEY GENERATE.

What think you now,—has Radicalism no beliefs that can generate enthusiasm! None that make a piety! What was piety, as I named it at the outset? That gamut of religious feeling that ranges from fear, through hushing movements of reverence, gratitude, trust, aspiration, peace, joy—up, or in, to love. And can a soul possessed by these two grand beliefs of the One in All and the Each in All, in whom they stand for glowing facts that glow more brightly every day,—can such a soul be other than an instrument ever thrilling with the music of those movements?—What were piety's expressions? Duty and Worship. Must such a one not have a singer's heart, and a singer's look and way, and an earnest trier's—if need be,—a martyr's life?

What is there in religious experience that does not sound familiar to his own? "He leadeth me beside still waters,"—O yes, we know the stillness of that leading. "God is our refuge and strength—a very present help in time of trouble!" Indeed He is! "Though we walk through the valley of the shadow of death, we fear no evil,"—how can we? "Nothing can separate us from the love of God"! O Paul, we know it, too, and the memory of certain high moments so abides in us that we think we understand your hour when—in the body or out of the body you knew not—you were caught up into Paradise and heard the words unspeakable. "Blessed are the pure in heart,"—Yes, Jesus, we have stood—and seen Him too! Seen Him,—while we add as you did from our humblest consciousness, "Not good—there is none good but He."

The Orthodox speak of a "Christian consciousness," and deny that any one can have it save they who, besides repentance, see the love of God revealed in a redeeming Christ. I know not what this "Christian consciousness" may be, and have often wished, in talking with an Orthodox friend, that I could see into his consciousness, as he thought he was seeing into mine, and find out what it was he felt that I did not; what this added feeling was that was not reverence, or trust, or peace, or joy, or even (I say it slowly) love of God; this feeling > "That cannot be explained in words,

> That lies too deep for looks,
> That finds no way into the face,
> No written vent in books,"— or, rather, as shown forth in words, and looks, and books, and life, cannot be distinguished from what Radicals would call the religious consciousness, the love of God. I cannot think it is higher or deeper than that consciousness, that it is anything peculiarly their own, or anything new, save to each individual, Orthodox or Radical, as he awakes to freshening sensibility towards the God around him.

On the other hand, there is nothing new in the feeling which our beliefs excite. In kind, it is the same old reverence, and trust, and love, that the other seekers know. Nor even are our two beliefs new save as any fulfilment may claim that title. They are simply the old "Fatherhood of God and Brotherhood of Man," (for us) more intensely, more widely, more vitally realized. But, thus realized, they seem to us to make an interpretation of the universe the grandest and the best fitted to excite the feelings to the utmost.

Perhaps the general difference between the two pieties may be summed up in one word. The more common Christian feeling centres in the sense of dependence,—"My Father is greater than I." The Radical piety centres rather in the sense of kinship,—"I and the Father are one." The dependence on God is kinship with him, it is true; the kinship is dependence certainly. But the difference of emphasis seems to set life to a somewhat different rhythm. Instead of pity, the thought is sympathy. Instead of grace, the thought is of the Immutable Morality in things, that can do us no wrong. Instead of gifts, the thought expects. Instead of petitions our prayer becomes a song of praise for past and trust for future. Nature becomes a vast coöperative system of helpfulness in which all ministers to all most surely, and each,—somehow, somewhere, somewhen,—is sure to be provided for in the way best possible. And this recognition of a Helping Universe fuses into feeling towards Him who is the One-Within-It-All,—of whom we say "Him,"—our God, our Father." A mystery still!

O yes, indeed. Our piety never claims to rest on a complete solution of the universe; and yet, while incomplete, it gives this sense of companionship with its Eternity and its Sublimity!

This is the piety of Radicalism,—if one likes to give or take that name. To what utter purity it summons us as with the voice of all Beatitudes, and the demands of ever-freshening Gospels! For every fact in Nature becomes a Beatitude, and every day brings its new Gospel,—"Repent, repent,—and the heaven lies close at hand!"

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, of Boston, tells a good story of what a Western farmer thought of Emerson's ability as a lecturer. The farmer was on the Lyceum Committee. Mr. Clarke asked him what lecturers they had heard before their Lyceum. He named several, and among others "a man by the name of Emerson." Mr. Clarke asked him how they liked him. "Well," said he, "we had him last winter, and, though he was pretty dull, he seemed to have a good many good ideas, and so we thought we ought to encourage him, and we have invited him to come again this winter."—Presbyterian.

THE TEACHER of the infant Sunday-school class noticed one little fellow who was not listening to what she said. She had been telling the story of David and Goliath; and wishing to see if he knew what she had been talking about, she suddenly asked, "Johnny, who killed Goliath?" With an inquiring look he replied, "Why, I didn't know he was dead."

INFALLIBLE GUIDES.

Editor of The Index:

Dear Sir,—In addition to all the great departments of the Government, we have also here in Washington an abundant supply of churches, and of all shades of opinion, from those in which the pure Orthodox doctrine is dispensed to those in which there is but the slightest tincture of the faith. The Mother of Churches is very ably represented, and her most offensive tenets are freely and boldly uttered, and all the more freely that no public journal seems to have the inclination or the courage to question them. Recently Father Garesché, of the Society of Jesus, delivered two discourses on the infallibility of the Pope which were reported at length, and no journal of the city expressed any doubt of the reasonableness of the doctrine, nor, so far as I am informed, did any Protestant pulpit make it an occasion for a discussion of the subject.

As I am personally not so strong in the fundamental tenets of Christian doctrine as to make my membership in any church a desirable acquisition, and as I am, notwithstanding, both willing and eager to learn about the faith, I seized the first opportunity after reading the lectures to master the theme, and so called on another father of the Society of Jesus to propose some doubts that had disturbed my peace, and get his explanations. In truth, I was anxious to have my faith in regard to so important a concern built upon a rock.

The father having received me very kindly, and expressed his willingness to afford me such relief as he could, I opened the interview by proposing a difficulty which had much embarrassed me, namely, that in the matters most directly affecting human interests Providence had furnished no infallible guide. In medicine, secular law, politics, agriculture, and the arts, I remarked, there is no infallible rule, and no personal authority to announce one. The larger part of the human race die in infancy; and of those that attain to adult years, said I, the majority are prematurely precipitated into the future world without an adequate probation. The laws of disease are not known, and the conditions of social and political well-being are equally hidden. Only after a series of ages of blundering experiment does man discover the laws of health, and the rules of social and political justice. He comes to knowledge in these relations only by transgression. How advantageous would it not be to man, said I, if in the professions of medicine and law, and in the vocations that provide food, clothing, and shelter for the body, there were an infallible personal authority; for example, an infallible doctor for maladies, an infallible lawyer for litigious people, one infallible person who knows all about farming, and an infallible mechanic, and critic for all the arts! Reasoning, said I, from the analogy of Nature, as Providence suffers the race, in all these departments so profoundly affecting its welfare, to blunder into the knowledge of his laws, I should suppose the same rule would hold in all spheres of action and in all worlds, and especially in this and the next; that as man is essentially a free moral agent, he would always continue to be so; and that, if his being be continued beyond this life, the opportunity to err and grow wiser would run parallel with the duration of his existence.

"There, my dear son," said the father, "is precisely your fundamental error. The analogy of Nature does not run beyond this life. The post mortem state is a supernatural one, a true realm of miracle where naught that is natural ever occurs. If man is a free agent here, he loses that feature of his proper human personality there. And it is because nothing is natural in that world that we need an infallible guide to it in this. Infallible guides are required in religion, and in that province of morals that deals with our post mortem state, because our common faculties have no adequate hold of the supreme object of religion, or avenue to the discovery of our true religious duties. The realm with which religion has to do being extra-natural, all our relations to it should be of the same character. You infer that, because we have no infallible guide in medicine, law, politics, and agriculture, we are not to expect one in religion and religious ethics. Let me tell you that no proper logical deductions can be made from the natural to the supernatural. Logic is valid in natural things, but between such and the supernatural there is a chasm which logic can neither overbridge nor help. It is consonant with the ordinary course of Nature that man should blunder through ages to discover the laws of Providence in medicine, law, politics, and agriculture; but in religion there has been but one blunder,—one, however, in which the whole human race have participated, and the evils of which all the ordinances of the true religion have been instituted to remedy."

You astonish me, said I; what was that?

"The fall of Adam," he answered; "are you so much of a heathen that you have never heard of it,—a fall from absolute perfection into sinfulness? The event was miraculous and supernatural, and its extension to the entire succession of human generations equally so; for neither the event nor its consequences can be explained by any natural process."

We seem, said I, to have found a starting point whence to comprehend Father Garesché's lecture, at least. Would you say, then, that religion has mainly to do with supernatural relations?

"That is its principal sphere," replied the father; "the chief duties of religion being extra-natural or supernatural, you see how impossible it should be for men to blunder into the discovery of them, as he does into the discovery of natural duties. The world can, in the exercise of its natural faculties, grope its way to the knowledge that justice, charity, truthfulness, temperance, and similar virtues flow with the main stream of the system of Nature; but how could it by any natural steps arrive at a knowledge of the seven sacraments and the duties relating to them?"

Well, said I, I do not see how any natural reasoning, or at least natural training, would hit upon any of them, unless perhaps matrimony be an exception.

"No son of Loyola, at all events," said the father, laughing, "is expected to have any natural knowledge of that sacrament. Our knowledge of the relations that should exist between the sexes is mostly abnormal."

You need not dwell upon that point, I replied; I am familiar with the incidents of the cause célèbre, known in French judicial annals as the affair "Girard-Cadière;" and, to return to the main question, I think I am to understand that religion is concerned chiefly with supernatural relations. Pray go on now, and deduce the necessity of an infallible bishop from that principle. I am panting with impatience to get at the core of the matter.

"I can put the whole thing in a nutshell," said he. "Man in his primeval ancestor, as I have remarked, underwent a fall, by which the whole race became supernaturally liable to two penalties,—one, physical death; the other, post mortem misery. Providence decided to redeem him, and so, having provided the means of redemption, he constituted a corporate society to be the custodian of the truths, rules, and appliances, by which this redemption could be dispensed during the continuance of the race. Now you perceive, do you not, that, unless there were some infallible arbiter to decide what these truths, rules, and appliances are, whole generations might be in doubt in regard to them, and thus fail of redemption?"

Let me interrupt you one moment, said I, to inquire whether this divine society, by which you doubtless mean the Church, has during its entire history been able to exhibit one specimen in which the first penalty of the fall has been remitted? Or, in other words, if the fall carried with it two penalties, physical death and post mortem misery, why is not the redemption coëxtensive with the fall and its consequences? Why is the penalty of physical death not remitted?

"I must again suggest to you," said the father, "that, religion being concerned with supernatural things, the proceedings of the Church have aspects entirely incomprehensible to natural reason. If she therefore occupy herself chiefly with dispensing redemption from post mortem misery, and if she display no power to dispense remission of physical death, though remitting sins every day, it is for some supernatural reason that the carnal mind cannot appreciate."

You might have taken a shorter route to the same conclusion, might you not? I asked. If she deal mainly with supernatural matters, and if logic has no validity in that realm, why not say bluntly at once that she is not amenable to reason at all, and is not bound to answer at that bar, except in so far as she regards it necessary to confound the faculty of reason itself? But I am delighted with your semblances of reasoning. You were talking of the infallible arbiter. Please go on.

"I was about to remark," continued the father, "that the Church needs an infallible arbiter, that there may not for a moment fail to be in the world a sure source of knowledge of the means of redemption from post mortem misery."

But the Protestants, said I, think they have that knowledge stored up in the Book, every statement of doctrine and fact in which is held to be so true that it is not open to question; and every precept contained in it to be good and right for the time and place to which it is to apply.

"The Book," answered the father, "is an infallible guide, but only in the original, and not in translations which are alone accessible to most of the laity. Having been written in remote ages, it needs in various portions an infallible interpreter to infuse an intelligible sense into those passages that are obscure on account of their antiquity, or for other causes. For example, Moses teaches in Genesis that on the second day of creation God created a solid expanse over the earth called a firmament. This firmament, he also seems to teach, had windows to let down the rain, and in it the sun and stars are fastened to give light. Now, as long as the Protestant laity read this account, as they do most of the Book, in a very prosaic and stupid way, things go on smoothly. But the moment a reader of that confession comes to see that the writer meant what he said, namely, that the sky is solid, he is fearfully perplexed; and having a natural knowledge that the fact is not so, he rejects the account, and in all likelihood the authority of the Book with it. But the Catholic layman relies on two infallible supports, the letter of the Book and the living voice of the Church; and when he finds apparent contradictions in the Book, he is not disturbed, but falls back on his priest, who smooths away his difficulties by an elastic and unctuous interpretation such as might be expected to flow from his supernatural endowments."

Your summary argument, said I, in proof of the necessity, and therefore probable reality, of one infallible bishop for the whole Church seems to make Father Garesché's lectures gleam with a double lustre. Would you please enlarge a little upon a point which he appears not to have discussed as fully as could be wished? How is it that the Head of the Church is capable of living a sinful and even grossly immoral life, and at the same time is able to promulgate infallible Christian doctrine? Father Garesché is reported to have asserted that it is even possible that the Head of the Church might die in mortal sin, but that his liability to sin does not impair his infallibility. Is this true? Can the Pope be an immoral man and yet be infallible?

"The two attributes are not incompatible in the Popes," the father replied. "Alexander VI. was abominably wicked as a man, but as Pope he was not capable of error, because, when teaching the Church, a Pope acts officially and is guided by God."

Suppose, I inquired, he should secretly become a heretic, and should perversely take advantage of his position to promulgate flagrant heresy, and to do it wilfully. Would he be infallible in such a case?

The father hesitated a moment, and finally replied with a smile: "God might allow any personal immorality in a Pope but that. The wilful promulgation of heretical doctrine is a form of wickedness that I imagine God could never permit in a Pope."

But have you any guarantee against it? I asked.

"I do not think of any but the goodness of God," replied the father.

And I notice, said I, that the "goodness of God" frequently gives way at the point where the stress of human need is greatest. If God permits any taint of human wickedness in an infallible Pope, I do not see why such extreme wickedness as the wilful promulgation of heresy may, not once only, but often, be expected. There seems occasion to regret that the infallibility of the Church has been taken away from the corporate body, by the recent decision of the great council at Rome, and relegated entirely to the Pope. But, I asked, where was that infallibility vested before that decree was pronounced? The Popes have not become for the first time infallible since the sitting of the Œcumenical Council?

"The Popes have always been infallible," replied the father.

But the Church did not know where the infallibility was lodged, said I, till the decree of the Council was pronounced.

"Just so," said he.

Which means, said I, that the Church has always been in possession of infallible truth, but had no infallible knowledge of any way to give it expression, whether by councils or by the ipse dixits of the Popes only, till within the last five years.

"That is the real state of the case," said the father. "And there have been times when the infallibility itself was in what I might call a state of suspense; for example, when the Council of Constance deposed John XXIII. Here was an instance in which the Pope was infallible and opposed to the Council, and the Council infallible and opposed to the Pope in the dispensation of the light of the Church. You may find it hard to understand how both could be infallible, and yet wielding conflicting powers."

But I do understand it, I said; it is on the broad principle that the doctrines and functions of the Church are not amenable to reason, and may even outrage it, and yet be perfectly valid in the sphere of religion. After all, father, I continued, the adherents of the two largest fragments of the rent body of Christ appear to me to get on no better than persons who are not in a state of grace. The infallibility of the Popes of the good Catholic lapses for long years into coma, and the teachings of the Protestant's infallible Book are transfused through a fallible translation. Practically it amounts to nothing; we have neither less nor more light in religion, by reason of infallible books and bishops, than if no pretensions to the possession of such treasures were advanced. Christendom, divided into three great confessions—Catholic, Protestant, and Greek—is proof patent, to all that have eyes, that the claim to infallibility will never largely contribute to allay religious dissension, the greatest social bane of our world.

"But you must admit," said the father, "that the tenet is a solace and a support to such as believe in it, and so far justifies itself."

If, I replied, to be palsied with an unreasoning dread in the presence of the mysteries of life, if to cherish the conviction that the supreme human peril is danger from God,—if this is religion, then the more infallible oracles we have, the better. But if the untrammelled aspiration to the good, the true, and the beautiful is the essence of religion, then the free pursuit of these objects, with all the risks involved in it, is better than any infallible guide, whether priest or book; for the horizon of my spiritual being, inspired by such a pursuit, is never fixed, but widens forever with the ascending progress of the soul.

At this moment the bell of St. Aloysius rang for a religious service; and as to prolong the discussion would have been neither courteous to the father nor instructive to me, I bade him good day. D. L.

LIGHTENING THE SHIP.

The Rev. C. A. Bartol spoke to his congregation Sunday before last upon the subject of "Christmas; what it is." His criticism of Free Religion was in striking contrast with that of Dr. Hedge, given from the same pulpit on the preceding Sabbath, who characterized this new belief, which is winning its way to the heads and hearts of thoughtful men and women, as spiritual dilettanteism, a cloudy, unsubstantial, unintelligible thing, with no groundwork of faith, and offering no hope of mental enlargement, or healthier, truer life.

Dr. Bartol took as his text a single sentence from the account of Paul's voyage from Crete, contained in the Acts; and with vivid illustrations drawn from modern life, and presented in the eloquent impressiveness of manner which is his habitual possession, he fashioned his words into a sermon to which no abstract can do justice.

"They lightened the ship." It was a thing commonly done in stress of weather, or when unusual danger threatened. The ship was one of the oldest emblems used to represent the Church. It was a thing most familiar to the immediate followers of Christ, and the story of a voyage, sketched with all the circumstantial clearness and detail of Paul's, was to them profoundly impressive and suggestive. So too this symbol of throwing overboard the cargo, that thereby they might gain new hope of safety, has a significant meaning to us. It was the symbol of all reform. To get rid of the impediments to progress; to disabuse men's minds of false ideas and beliefs; to enlighten them, to cast out bad, and supplant them with better views of living,—this was the vital question, the real essence of all reform. This was the office, the object of Free Religion: namely, to help men. The fidelity and earnestness of those connected with the movement was to him sufficient indication that this was its real purpose. Their characters forbade any other conclusion. Those who advocated it were trying to clear the cargo of encumbrances which, unless thrown over, would sink the ship. It was not to be derided, not to be sneered at, but commended.

Certainty of accomplishing the voyage and reaching the haven was of as much importance as the cargo. Churches all about us had been celebrating the circumstance of Christ's birth, of the supposed day of which nothing in reality was known. The true point was to celebrate his object. That was to bring justice and right into the economy of his times, to throw overboard the dead weight of Jewish superstition, to do away with the long continued customs of revenge and retaliation, and to urge upon the people methods of clemency, reducing the Ten Commandments to two, love to God and love to man. He worked that the human soul might be advanced, and his work was an impressive God-speed.

It is not what we take, but what we get rid of, that is the essence of religion. The tea ships lightened in Boston by a mob, outraging British propriety and violating law, was an act which ennobled those who participated in it. Those men are our saints. People boast their descent from these men, and deem it a prouder honor than to derive it from the Puritans. Were heraldry in vogue, escutcheons would flash with the significance of the act. But when we come together in Faneuil Hall to celebrate our appreciation of that brave deed, and invite a woman to speak upon that occasion, we give her to understand that no unpleasant subject of woman's rights shall be touched upon, since lack of sympathy would compel many of her sex to leave the Hall. What a sanctifier is antiquity! Pleading wisely or unwisely, her plea upon the subject nearest her heart could not be admitted. Fancy the grim smile on the faces of those ancestors of tea-spilling renown!

In what contrast with that memorable scene is the celebration which we have just witnessed! Flags and garlands decorate and beautify the Hall. Significant mottoes cover the walls. "No taxation without representation" is the key-note of their meaning. We publish, and are proud to publish, the story of these tea-spillers, whom we delight to honor. But mobs, like men, are moved by high and also by low motives. What a difference it makes whether their opposition is opposition to wrong or not! No one is anxious to derive his pedigree from any of the mob who dragged Garrison through the streets of Boston with a halter about his neck. Who can help honoring the man for his courageous advocacy of the cause of Anthony Burns? He stood for right; the mob this time was on the side of wrong and oppression. A poor slave, a man like you and me, was to be delivered back into captivity. He wanted to be free, to be himself, his own self, as Douglass said; but Massachusetts, with the strong arm of the law and her militia to give her power, felt obliged to say to this poor slave, "You are not yourself, your own self, as you think you are; you belong to your master; his claim is the only one that we allow."

"Conquer your prejudices," said Webster. "Conquer the unholy precedent of depriving a human creature of life and liberty," humanity said; and humanity's emphatic insistence was a prophecy of the end.

Slavery has been thrown overboard from the ship of State; but the safety of the vessel or its freight is not yet assured. She seems still a hulk, tossed and driven by the waves and winds. Corruption, fraud, defalcation, base sins of omission and commission, hold high carnival. Luxury in diet and in dress is a potential sign of disaster, and withholds the hope of better days. Sumptuary laws will not avail; the remedy, to be effective, must be radical and universal in its application. How much there is to throw overboard!

The women can be powerful agents of reform; let them begin by throwing overboard tobacco. It must all be fought out on the old ground of opposition to taxation without representation. Hundreds of millions of dollars go up in smoke. No benefit resulted; it was only an annoyance. Woman was the chief sufferer; hers was the power to eradicate the mighty evil. While her heart was sore for justice, let her hasten the day by endeavoring to break men of a costly and injurious habit; let her hasten it by reform in her own dress; added grace, and greater capacity and power for good would come thereby. Both had habits that harmed and were not helpful; and if they were one, they would see the necessity of reform. Everywhere we are saluted with the pipe or cigar. Vital piety smokes. Clouds of smoke bar your way to the study of the clergyman, and the layman was his humble follower. It attested the truth of the old adage, "Like people, like priest." Moderation was no virtue; it only evinced the tact for becoming immoderate. It was idle to talk of retrenchment. No wonder times were hard. And yet men cried, "What despair, what inhuman atheism, to protest against such a thing!" But protestation might avail; it had power to save.

It should be thrown overboard; tobacco, rum, and opium should go together. "Look not upon the wine when it is red," were words which had a vital meaning to-day. It is red, red with the heart's blood of women—of wives and mothers and children. Abstinence was the only safe course; abstinence alone would lighten the ship.

The women must be adjuncts of reform, and their aid accepted. They have been ignored, they have been treated as the old sea-captain proposed to treat them, when his ship was beset by stress of weather. "Throw over the women," he commanded; "even if they were coffee they must go." In many ways they have been thrown overboard. Take them as companions, as friends, and they will help. To quote Paul's words, "Except these abide in the ship, you cannot be saved." Education, as girls merely, will be their curse. Coëducation will be a blessing. What inheritance or custom hinders their standing up with boys? If there is any, let them lighten themselves of it. Let them be ambitious; not inheritors, but creators; not mistresses, but wives. Let them be women; love, tenderness, sympathy, noble trust and forbearance, were essentially womanly; and woman, though wedlock should be abolished, stood nearest the angels in her mission of helpfulness to man.

But "what had this to do with Christmas?" one might ask. It had everything to do with it, but nothing to do with Christmas pomp. "Mass" meant dismissal from ecclesiastical attendance; dismission each to his own house and way. What a perversion to apply it to the transubstantiation of Christ's body in the bread and wine! Christ's mission, the thing that was almost wholly lost sight of, was to help and uplift his fellows. Our forefathers, with all their bigotry, were right in loyalty to law and God, in their opposition to frivolous amusement and unnecessary pomp and show. They were extreme but just. Christmas was not complete in the hewing down of woods or in hanging the churches with garlands of flowers. It was all appropriate, all to be commended, unless the higher significance of the event was lost sight of. The real spirit of its right observance consisted in the going to our true avocations and duties. Christ went with one poor garment to the cross, and gave his life thereon. The music of poetry and truth in life affects us all. There was one brief hour of staggering before the trial, and then so calm, so greatly strong was he, that we forget all in this ennobling act. He found his haven in the cross. Go like him to your tasks and struggles. True life is not a life of ease, but of service; and service is to resolve and to be strong to bear all the trials that come upon you; and to bear them heroically. What you call that which you feel is outside of, and higher than yourself, it matters not. God, Christ, Holy Ghost, Spirit—he preferred the last,—it was all the same. The name did not change it, and it would not be defined. Forceythe Wilson, telling of the hard battle of Fort Henry,—how hard pressed the Union forces were, and how disaster and repulse seemed inevitable,—writes that at last it seemed there was a hand at every ring, a something at every rope, and in all a patriotic soul, a divine will upholding and helping them. This power was in and of us, acted through and helped us. But we must mind the helm; a single false motion, a swerving from the direct path, and all was lost. So it resolved itself into the simple precept, "Mind your navigation."

[FOR THE INDEX.]

ONE DAY IN SEVEN.

BY MRS. DAVID H. CLARK.

Into all bloom that is born of the sunlight,
Far from the hurrying steps on the street,—
Far from the world-throbs that endlessly beat,— Wan faces gather, wan comrades to greet,
Into the bloom that is born of the sunlight.

One day in seven, the click of the needles,
Heave of the engines, and hum of the wheels,
Great pulsing arteries, bobbins and reels,
Pause in the hush that humanity feels,— Pausing one day from the click of its needles.

Down on the avenues, stately and solemn,
Frown the gray arches where worshippers bend;
Fall the grave accents, "Ye shall not offend
One of these little ones;" organ-tones blend
'Neath the gray arches stately and solemn.

Clusters of lilies gracefully swaying
Shower the dust from their deep golden cells,
Swinging their censers, their crystalline bells;
But where is the tale their humility tells,
White on the altars fragrantly swaying?

Humility? Ah, not in bosoms that flutter
With triumphs of laces, and satins, and gems,
Of diamond-stars trembling on filigree stems,
Of 'broidery and depth of phylactery-hems,—
Ah! not in the bosoms that these things can flutter.

Deep in the cool of the greenness and silence,
Worn Labor rests, and is peaceful and glad,
Stretches its limbs in its coarse raiment clad,
Takes the good gifts that are sure to be had
Deep in the cool of the greenness and silence.

BOSTON, JANUARY 8, 1874.

SUNDAY LECTURES.—The Editors of The Index will lecture occasionally on Sundays, if desired, within a convenient distance of Boston.

CASH PREMIUMS FOR 1874.

In order to increase the circulation of The Index, and thereby make it a more powerful instrumentality in the reform to which it is devoted, the following Cash Premiums are now offered:—

1. The Index will pay to any one of its old subscribers $1.00 for every new subscription of $3.00 obtained by his or her means and forwarded to this office. If preferred, the $1.00 may be deducted before remitting. This offer holds good for new subscriptions alone, and not for renewals.

2. In addition to this, it offers One Hundred Dollars to the person who shall send the largest list of new subscribers, with the money, before the first day of February, 1874, and Fifty Dollars to the person sending the next largest list during the same time.

There are many warm friends of The Index throughout the country who would be glad to help increase its circulation, if they could only afford to give their time to the work. The above offers will enable them to do so. Supposing that the largest list sent contains one hundred new names, the sender will be entitled to $100.00 as commission and another $100.00 as premium. Will not many of our lady subscribers, who are the most efficient of all canvassers, seize this opportunity to help The Index without too great a sacrifice on their own part?

GLIMPSES.

A chorus of admiration has followed the public exhibition of Mr. Morse's bust of Parker. A prophet is not always without honor in his own country; nor a sculptor either.

New York has three hundred and fifty churches, estimated as worth about $46,000,000. It is all untaxed, of course,—which means that other people pay taxes for the proprietors. How long will "other people" continue their remarkable generosity?

Professor Max Mueller has kindly forwarded to us a copy of his lecture on "Christian Missions," recently given in Westminster Abbey, and mentioned in Mr. Voysey's interesting "London letter" of last week as causing a profound sensation in England. It will be published in The Index just as soon as room can be made for it.

Some bright genius sends us a postal card without date or signature, saying—"Please send my paper hereafter to Indianapolis, Indiana." He is like the fond Irish mother who directed her letter—"To my son, in Gen. Washington's army." The only way to be sure of fulfilling this remarkable order (which is only a sample of many others) will be to mail the whole edition of The Index to Indianapolis.

Mr. Frothingham had a most flattering audience last Sunday at his opening lecture in Horticultural Hall. Before the lecturer arrived, the Hall was packed, the aisles being filled and great numbers being obliged to go away from the door for lack of room. Next week, by Mr. Frothingham's kindness, we shall have the pleasure of publishing the lecture (which is one of his ablest efforts) in The Index; and we hope to be enabled to follow it with most, if not all, of the succeeding lectures.

The "First Report of the Directors of the Newton [Mass.] Home for Orphans and Destitute Girls" tells the simple story of a beautiful charity most wisely conducted. The "Home" is truly such, as is shown by the touching manner in which the little creatures it shelters welcomed a poor blind child among them. Here is Free Religion put into practice; and we are proud to note the names of some kind friends of The Index among its Directors and benefactors. Prosperity attend it!

It is found necessary, on account of the hard times, not to carry out at present, in every case, the rule discontinuing The Index immediately on the expiration of the term of subscription. But it will still remain the principle to be aimed at and obeyed as far as practicable. Meanwhile we must appeal to the honor of our subscribers to notify us at once, if any of them wish to discontinue the paper. We hope however, that every one will not only renew his own subscription, but kindly send a new one at the same time.

If the crowd that crammed themselves into Horticultural Hall last Sunday till it positively steamed with perspiration, or the multitudes that went away disappointed because they could not get in, would only make a small deposit regularly in the "Donation" box at the door, the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association would be enabled to engage the great Hall on the floor above; which they would be more than glad to do. But in view of the fact that the box aforesaid contained only $5.85 at the end of Mr. Frothingham's most admirable lecture, the Committee feel that they cannot afford the large additional expense. Will a "word to the wise" (and the generous) be sufficient?

"He leaves a wife and family." This is the curt statement at the end of the newspaper report of many a terrible casualty. What a world of pathos is condensed into those half-dozen words! The unrecorded agony in the humble home,—the heart-broken wife, the weeping children, the gaunt and ravenous "wolf at the door,"—these receive but a passing thought, as we hurry away to our business. Let not the angel of Pity fly so lightly from your hearts, you who have means to send her burdened with blessings into the obscure darkness and misery of the stricken household. The next time that hard epitome of tragedy meets your eye, let it be a divine message to hasten with sympathy and compassion, aye, with all the tenderness of a religion that is pure love for suffering humanity, to do the little or the much you can towards lifting off the millstone of sudden despair.

The banking house of David Preston & Co., of Detroit, have issued a circular to their correspondents containing their "Statement of Dec. 15," from which we extract the following remarkable passage:—

"What is the outlook now? It's better.

"September 27th, after the financial wave had rolled over us, and crushed us for the moment to the earth, trusting, not in National Banks, not in Savings Banks, not in our friends, who had done business with us and stood with us and by us, some of them for more than twenty years, but trusting in the Lord, we said: 'There's light ahead—there's help in God. There's wealth in Jesus—there's power in prayer.' We believed it then; we believe it now.

"Sept. 5th, our demand liabilities were.....	$1,005,594.37
Sept. 27th, " " "	860,756.07
To-day, Dec. 15th, our total liabilities are but..	344,445.16
Our demand liabilities are but.....	199,774.61

"Since October 1st, we have issued $144,665.47 in time certificates of deposit, payable in three and six months from date, bearing 7 per cent. interest. These time certificates will be promptly paid as they mature. How have you paid this $650,000? Answer: We have paid it in faith, in greenbacks, in national currency, in Detroit City 7s, in Bay City 8s, and in first-class commercial paper, maturing most of it in thirty, sixty, and ninety days from its date."

If these gentlemen found "wealth in Jesus," and paid part of their liabilities with nothing better than "faith," we congratulate the Index Association on holding none of their paper.

The proposal to tax church property at an equitable rate is meeting with favor from the most influential secular papers of this city. The Boston Daily Advertiser of Dec. 23 had the subjoined paragraph on the subject:—

A petition is in circulation, enforced by a tract, entitled An Appeal for Equal Taxation and No Exemption, asking for the repeal of the statutes exempting from taxation property held for religious and charitable purposes. Though the petition is aimed at all corporate societies now favored by the tax-gatherer,—scientific, literary and educational, as well as charitable and religious,—the tract makes a special point on the exemption of "meeting-houses," which, if they were treated like other property, would afford immediate and sensible relief. The value of "meeting-house" property in Massachusetts is placed at about twenty-three millions, which, at the average rate of taxation this year, would have yielded upwards of $330,000. Of this property, it is claimed that a portion is held, like Tremont Temple for example, under church organizations, while rented and used for all sorts of profitable purposes requiring the protection of the laws. The entire value of this untaxed property, which is exclusive of all State property, foots up $37,410,840, the tax on which this year would have been $542,083. This large exemption, it is further claimed, makes it necessary to impose unfair, and in some cases oppressive, assessments upon other property, which would not be borne if such an annual donation were made or attempted in any other form.

A NOTE FROM MR. FOX.

We cheerfully comply with the wish expressed by Mr. Fox below. The reason why the "introduction" was omitted last week was simply that we were republishing the correspondence between Mr. Fox and Mr. Potter, not that between Mr. Fox and the editor of the Christian Register. If it had occurred to us that any injustice was done by this omission, the "introduction" would of course have been printed.

To the Editor of The Index:—

Not caring to reply to the long letter addressed to me by Charles Thomas Fowler in your last week's paper, I will ask you to insert, as a sufficient explanation to your readers of my neglect to answer this letter, as well as my last from Mr. Potter, the following brief communication, sent by me to the Christian Register, with Mr. Potter's letter, and printed there as an introduction to it, and which I should have been glad to find, with the correspondence, in your columns. G. W. F.

"To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

"When I sent you, last week, the correspondence between Mr. Potter and myself, I, of course, supposed it had ended, and that, by writing at the close of his last letter that he forbore saying anything further as to the meaning of the word Christian, he meant that he would forbear altogether, satisfied that a discussion of this point was uncalled for in such a correspondence; but, quite unexpectedly, another letter afterwards came from him, which I now send to you. As Mr. Potter is very anxious to have it printed, I hope you will find room for it in your next paper, even though you may agree with me in thinking that it does not form an essential part of the correspondence,—my purpose, in asking him whether his name was in the Year Book list of Unitarian ministers with his 'knowledge and consent,' not being to discuss with him the interpretation of the term Christian, but simply to learn whether he considered himself as belonging on a list of Christian ministers. I will not ask you to add a word of reply from me, being wholly satisfied to leave my last letter as the proper close to my part of a correspondence, begun with no other desire than to have a list of Christian ministers, for the correctness of which I am responsible, contain the names of none, by their own avowal, not Christians.

"George W. Fox, Ass't Sec'y."

THE UNITARIAN CRISIS.

Last week we republished correspondence of no ordinary interest between Mr. Potter and the Assistant Secretary of the American Unitarian Association. This week we also republish the comments made on it by the Christian Register (Boston) and the Liberal Christian (New York), the two papers supported by the Unitarian denomination. We now wish to add something on the same subject, in criticism of these critics.

1. "The only question directly involved in this correspondence," says the Register, "was one of fact: Did Mr. Potter's name belong in a list of Unitarian Christian ministers?" On the contrary, there were two questions, and wholly distinct ones: Did Mr. Potter's name belong in that list? and, On whom rested the responsibility of putting and keeping it there? On both points a difference of opinion seems to exist between Mr. Fox and Mr. Potter.

Mr. Fox considers that no name belongs in that list except the names of "Christians;" to him it is a list of Christians as well as of Unitarians. Mr. Potter considers that the names of non-Christians might properly be included, on the ground that they are still Unitarians, as opposed to Trinitarians; to him it is a list of Unitarians, and not of Christians. Mr. Fox considers that all Unitarians are necessarily Christians; Mr. Potter considers that Unitarians may be either Christians or non-Christians. The one takes the ecclesiastical, the other the non-ecclesiastical view of Unitarianism. While, therefore, Mr. Fox regards it (and with reason) as quite improper that the name of any non-Christian should be included in a list of Christians, Mr. Potter regards it (with equally good reason) as quite unnecessary to exclude such a name from a list of Unitarians. To each the list means a different thing, according to the idea which each entertains of Unitarianism; and it must, we think, be conceded that each is right according to his own view of that list. Which of the two unlike practical judgments arrived at, as to the propriety of retaining Mr. Potter's name in the list, is correct, must depend on the answer to the question: Is Unitarianism merely one form of Christianity, or is it inclusive both of Christianity and non-Christianity?

A great deal may be said, with great force, on each side of this question. On the one hand, the Unitarian movement, which gave rise to the Unitarian name in this country as the name of a particular body of believers, was unquestionably a movement within the limits of Christianity. None of the early Unitarians claimed to be outside of Christianity; they all considered themselves Christians, and warmly defended themselves when the Orthodox tried to deprive them of the Christian name. On the other hand, some of the early Unitarians, like Dr. Channing, made the most absolute claims to spiritual freedom, vindicating the right of free thought without any qualification. This happened because it occurred to no one at that time to suspect that Christianity is necessarily, by its very nature, a limitation of liberty. Hence early Unitarianism, professing to be Christian and yet absolutely free, contained an inherent contradiction which is now forcing itself upon attention in spite of all efforts to the contrary. The views of Unitarianism held respectively by Mr. Fox and Mr. Potter, consequently, have each its historical justification; and one is no more consistent with facts than the other.

Yet none the less are we obliged to think that the Unitarian name, being the name of a sect which has at all times planted itself on Christianity, must be given up wholly to the Christian majority. The sect, as such, has never committed itself to a profession of unlimited liberty. All such professions have been made by individuals alone; and we hold the opinion that the Unitarian sect must, and has a right to, speak for itself in this matter. For this reason, we have regarded the name Unitarian, ever since the National Conference at Syracuse in 1866, as connoting the name Christian; and therefore, when we discovered in 1868 that we were not a Christian, we voluntarily and at once withdrew our name from the list of Unitarian ministers. We are obliged, with Mr. Fox, to think that the name of no non-Christian properly belongs in that list; while, at the same time, we think we do full justice to the cogent reasons of Mr. Potter for holding the contrary opinion. This conclusion is based on the general principle that every body of believers is bound by its collective utterances alone, and should neither bear the disadvantages, nor claim the benefits, of the utterances of individuals.

As to the other question: On whom rests the responsibility of putting and keeping Mr. Potter's name in the list of Unitarian ministers? we think that Mr. Potter is wholly right. Mr. Fox labored hard to throw upon him the responsibility of erasing his own name from that list; and Mr. Potter very wisely refused to accept any such responsibility. The list is made up by the Unitarian Association for its own purposes; and the Association alone should decide whom to enroll in it. The result of Mr. Potter's action, in thus compelling the Association openly to disfellowship all non-Christians, and forbidding it any longer to continue the cowardly and uncandid course of shirking the responsibility that belongs to it, must be most salutary to the cause of religious progress. In this aspect, his action was wiser than our own; and we see now that if, instead of requesting in 1868 that our name should be withdrawn from the Association's list of ministers, we had simply notified the Secretary that we were no longer a Christian or a Unitarian, and then left it to him to act on that notification, better results might have followed in some respects. By relieving him of all responsibility in the premises, we failed to put the Association in a position in which it must boldly and frankly declare itself to be on one side or the other in the issue between Christianity and Freedom; and the cause of religious advance owes much to Mr. Potter for his superior discernment in this matter. Now it has been made clear, even to the dullest comprehension, that every non-Christian is acting a disingenuous part by retaining without due notice his connection with the Unitarian Association, which, by its Assistant Secretary, now officially declares that all its ministers profess themselves Christians. If Mr. Fox's by-and-by overruled by the Association, the old nebulous state of things may return; but this is extremely unlikely. True it is, that the erasure of Mr. Potter's name from the authorized list of Unitarian ministers, by the American Unitarian Association, and for the sole reason that he does not call himself a Christian, is one of the most important acts ever done by that body; and its future consequences must be most important. At last Unitarianism has officially disfellowshipped all non-Christians; its antagonism to perfect freedom can no longer be questioned; and, however painful it may be, all non-Christians must now see clearly the duty that is laid upon them.

2. It remains to notice the comments of the Liberal Christian on the Fox-Potter correspondence. The writer of the brief article quoted elsewhere from this paper shows a strange lack of appreciation of Mr. Potter's action. He apparently blames Mr. Potter for not "requesting" that his name be erased. But with his expressed view of Unitarianism, it was not in the least incumbent upon Mr. Potter to do so. In his place, with our own view of Unitarianism, we should have felt called upon to notify the Secretary that we were neither a Christian nor a Unitarian; Mr. Potter did notify the Assistant Secretary that he was not a Christian, although in one sense a Unitarian. Nothing could have been more manly, direct, or sincere. If the "denomination" felt aggrieved by the "false position" of reckoning non-Christians among its ministers, it was its own fault alone; it held the remedy in its own hands; it had no business to be aggrieved because it lacked itself the moral courage to follow out its own Christian principles. This is not the first time that Mr. Potter has declined to claim the Christian name; why did not the Assistant Secretary, who now so innocently appears to have just discovered the fact, drop Mr. Potter's name years ago? We repeat, the Association, and not Mr. Potter, is responsible for any "misrepresentation" resulting from its own lack of courage and consistency. Ever since the National Conference in 1866, it has been the duty of the Assistant Secretary, just as much as it is now, to find out for himself who are Christians and who non-Christians, and to drop all the latter at once from his list. To blame Mr. Potter for not performing the Assistant Secretary's duties is to reproduce the old fable of the wolf and the lamb.

The inferences drawn from this unintelligent view of the matter have led the Liberal Christian into reflections on the "entire absence of unity among the leaders [officers?] of the Free Religious Association," and on Mr. Potter's "seeming want of independence." Both of these reflections are exceedingly unjust. The "unity" cherished by the Free Religious Association is one of spirit, purpose, and principle,—not of relationship to other organizations. It is in direct keeping with this unity that each member of the Association shall determine for himself what relations he will hold with other associations; as is explicitly provided by our Constitution. Mr. Frothingham and Mr. Potter have settled their relations with Unitarianism in different ways; they had an equal right to do so; neither feels annoyed or compromised by the other's action; each is responsible to himself alone in the matter, as is every other member of the Association. Will the world never discover that men may unite without trampling on each other's individuality? Instead of showing any "want of independence" or "individuality" by his action, Mr. Potter has shown himself signally endowed with these very qualities; and no one more rejoices in the fact than his comrades and associates. He has acted with the same purity of motive, with the same calmness and gentleness of spirit, which all who know him have learned to respect and love as the very essence of his "individuality;" and the Liberal Christian may rest assured that Mr. Potter and his fellow-workers have yet to discover the "absence of unity" which it deplores. Let all clearly understand that nothing but "independence" on his part, manifested in a very high degree, will explain his refusal to be made a pack-horse on which the Unitarian Association might lay the burden of its own special responsibilities. For one, we honor equally the courses taken by Mr. Frothingham and by Mr. Potter; we have not the slightest wish that either course should have been in any degree different from what it has been; and we see in each course the natural, unconstrained exercise of the individuality of the actor. These two gentlemen have, like others, most generously stood by us in the attempt to build up THE INDEX, and shared without a word whatever odium the attempt involved; but we never dreamed of interpreting this wholehearted coöperation in the cause of common principles as implying any indorsement of our own particular course or opinions on any subject. They have at all times, in the Free Religious Association and in THE INDEX, been true to their own independent individualities; and the unity which really exists among the officers of the Association is far too deep to be disturbed by any faithful following of the inner consciousness of duty, be the outward course what it may. O that mankind might learn what a profound bond of union is to be found in fidelity to individual ideals that are universally respected! That day will come; and it will come all the sooner because William J. Potter, than whom a sweeter or purer or braver spirit does not shine on earth, has been cast out of the Unitarian fellowship because he cannot pronounce the Unitarian shibboleth.

FROM MR. CONWAY.

We cannot, by any exercise of editorial virtue, resist the temptation of sharing this interesting little letter with our readers:—

51 NOTTING-HILL SQUARE, London, Dec. 18.

MY DEAR ABBOT:—

I think we could sell a dozen more INDEXES if they were sent, and you had best begin with the first number in January.

My Sacred Anthology is out. It is a volume of near five hundred pages, large octavo, and contains seven hundred and forty selections from the Scriptures and classic authors of the East. It has been liberally subscribed for, and is already paid for. A very handsome volume! . . . South Place Chapel has now been made into a Scientific Institute. During the week we have a scientific lecture by some eminent man, and the walls are covered with maps, or pictures of animals, fossils, &c. On Sunday night there is a scientific lecture of the same kind, with oratorio music and orchestra. On Sunday morning we try to deal with religion in the same method of science. On Sunday last John Fisk, of Cambridge, filled the pulpit, and gave a masterly lecture on Evolution, listened to and admired by a large audience, with many great men among them. On Sunday next he gives a second lecture. We are very flourishing at South Place, and have an average audience of four hundred,—the largest liberal (or Unitarian) society in England. Ever yours,

M. D. CONWAY.

Will not some enterprising publishing firm give us soon an American reprint of Mr. Conway's Sacred Anthology? Every liberal minister and lecturer would find it invaluable; and thousands of eager readers could be found for it at once.

MR. POTTER'S SUPPLEMENTARY LETTER.

[From the Christian Register, Dec. 20.]

When we accepted the Year Book correspondence, last week, we supposed it to be entirely closed; but it seems that although Mr. Potter himself understood the question relating to the directory to be decided, he had some additional thoughts to which he desired to give public expression, and we have printed them in our department of "Religious Intelligence."

The only question directly involved in this correspondence was one of fact. Did Mr. Potter's name belong in a list of Unitarian Christian ministers? It was settled by his explicit statement that he does not call himself a Christian. He grants that the omission is consistent with the modern view of Unitarianism, but insists that there is an "older and more fundamental" view of our denominational position, which would have warranted the retaining of the names of ministers of good character and pastors of "societies commonly recognized as Unitarian," even if these ministers had renounced Christianity, so long as they did not "especially request" that their names should be withdrawn.

That Unitarians were champions of the right of Free Inquiry in "the Channing era" is perfectly true. This is still one of their distinguishing characteristics. It is just as heartily acknowledged by Rev. E. H. Sears and Rev. Rufus Ellis as by Rev. Dr. Furness and Rev. J. W. Chadwick. None of our brethren believe in stifling free thought or free speech. All of them accept their theological opinions because they believe that they can be defended in the court of reason and conscience. But Mr. Potter strangely forgets that a claim to be inside the Christian Church is just as "old and fundamental" on the part of Unitarians as a love of Free Inquiry. When our fathers said "Christian character is the best test of Christian fellowship," they did not allude to those who withdrew from Christian fellowship and renounced the Christian name, but to those who, claiming to be Christians, were denied the name because of some dogmatical deficiency. They were ready to extend religious fellowship to faithful Jews and Mohammedans, and human fellowship to atheists and unbelievers in the immortal life, but, to a man, they always understood that only Christians could ask or receive Christian fellowship. They never expected that one who openly renounces Christianity would expect or desire to have his name retained in a list of Unitarian Christians. As much as this was substantially implied in the Preamble offered by Mr. Abbot, then a Christian, at the National Conference in 1866.

Mr. Potter's statement that he could in a degree consistently coöperate with the American Unitarian Association, although its object is to promote the interests of "pure Christianity," because he believes "that those who put that phrase into its constitution had preëminently in mind practical religion rather than any system of theology," shows that he is not familiar with the early history of the Association. Nothing can be better established than the fact that its founders meant by "pure Christianity" the religion taught by Christ freed from its corruptions and perversions. Only "Unitarian Christians" were "invited to unite and coöperate with this Association." At the first annual meeting, June 30, 1826, the Executive Committee, in their official report, speak of "the progress and present state of Unitarian Christianity," "Christians of our denomination," "other denominations of Christians," "our united efforts for the spread of the glorious gospel of our Lord and Savior," "the religion not of this man nor that party, but of Jesus Christ, our Master and Redeemer," "Christians from examination and conviction," &c. Judge Story, one of the Vice-Presidents, spoke of "Unitarian Christians" and "Unitarian Christianity." What the founders of the American Unitarian Association should have done may be an open question, but what they did do is beyond dispute.

We do not know that any one has ever questioned Mr. Potter's conscientiousness in not asking to have his name withdrawn, although, as he reiterates, in general religious views he stands on "essentially the same platform" with Messrs. Abbot and Frothingham who have more clearly perceived, the logical consequences of their renunciation of Christianity. If he thinks the Unitarians are journeying on the road which leads from Christianity to Free Religion, he has a right to his opinion, and to look back hopefully to see us cross over; but since he must admit that the denomination has not yet left Christendom, we cannot imagine why he cares to have it appear that he still remains in it. To his Free Religious associates, no less than to his Christian friends, he seems to occupy an entirely untenable position when he would be upon both sides at once. His sincerity is unquestionable; but so is his inconsistency.

That Mr. Potter will continue to be a life-member of the American Unitarian Association is as true as that Rev. Dr. Osgood remains so. That, like Dr. Osgood, he still finds some things that he can honor and approve in Unitarianism, we are glad, and we are sure that the personal ties between our ministers and himself will be unaffected by the change in ecclesiastical relations to which he is logically committed by his essential sympathy with Messrs. Abbot and Frothingham. We scarcely needed any assurance that Mr. Potter's sympathies and energies must "now" be given "mainly" to the Free Religious Association. During its entire existence, with absorbing and vigorous concentration, he has been its devoted and indefatigable Secretrary.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

[From the Liberal Christian, Dec. 27, 1873.]

The letters exchanged between Mr. Geo. W. Fox, Assistant Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, and Rev. W. J. Potter, of New Bedford, are models of courtesy on both sides. The position taken by Mr. Potter is surprising and significant. It is surprising because when a thoughtful man has deliberately joined a body professing certain principles, and thus has enrolled his name in the ranks of that body, it is reasonable to expect that when he deliberately renounces those principles, and publicly declares that he has done so, he should request that his name be omitted from the list into which is has been put. Only by so doing can he relieve himself and the body to which he has previously belonged from misrepresentation and from occupying a false position. This Mr. Potter did not do, and when the matter was brought to his notice in the most gentlemanly way he still declined to request that his name be stricken out, while at the same time he declared that he had given up those principles the acceptance of which led to his name being enrolled.

This position is significant as an indication of the entire absence of unity among the leaders of the Free Religious Association. Mr. Abbot relinquished the title "Christian" some time ago, and requested his name to be omitted from the list of Unitarian ministers. Mr. Frothingham was surprised and chagrined to find that his name had been kept on that list. Mr. Potter relinquishes the Christian name, but declines to assume any responsibility as to his name being kept in a list of those who call themselves Christians. It is further significant as an evidence of a seeming want of independence in a quarter whence we did not expect indication of such want. Our Free Religious friends have insisted strongly upon individuality, upon every person representing himself, but this leader among the Free Religionists certainly seems to fail of a true appreciation of independence when he knowingly allows himself to be classed as a supporter of views which he has renounced. The correspondence on the Unitarian side is also significant as indicating its inclusive and catholic spirit. Every man is invited to study the Christian records and the Christian spirit. If, then, he honestly calls himself a Christian and seeks fellowship from Unitarians, he is cordially welcomed. If he cannot call himself a Christian his honesty and independence are respected, his pure character is esteemed, but he is not expected to stultify himself by remaining in a false position.

THEODORE PARKER'S CONSCIENCE. — Theodore Parker, in his autobiography, tells a beautiful story of his childhood. It reveals a tender conscience in the boy, and a wise training in the mother. When he was four years old, he was passing a pond-hole in a field, and turned to look at a rare flower in the water. He saw a spotted tortoise sunning himself in the shallow water. Very naturally he lifted a stick he was carrying, to strike the reptile. But all at once a voice within him said, loud and clear, "It is wrong." He was surprised, and the uplifted stick fell. He hurried home, and asked his mother what it was that told him it was wrong. Taking him in her arms, she said: "Some men call it conscience, but I prefer to call it the voice of God in the soul of man. If you listen and obey it, then it will speak clearer and clearer, and always guide you right; but if you turn a deaf ear or disobey, then it will fade out little by little, and leave you all in the dark and without a guide. Your life depends on hearing this little voice." "I am sure," he says, "no event in my life made so deep and lasting an impression as that."

MONEY.

DEAR FRIEND:—

Allow me to suggest to you that "money" is not wealth, and is not property in the sense of wealth; and that, whilst the representative of wealth (i. e., money) can be furnished without labor, or very little, it can be loaned at a low rate; whilst the property it represents might and should draw a rent of several hundred per cent. more. Would not this view of money harmonize you and those you criticise?

LIMITATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

SANTA BARBARA, Cal., Dec. 14, 1873.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—It seems to me that another article should be added to the "Demands of Liberalism," to wit, "That no religious organization should be allowed to hold any more real estate than the lands and the buildings on them, occupied by them as places of worship."

The Trinity Church of New York holds a good many acres of valuable land in New York city which they have leased from time to time. This land they have held since our Revolution, and much of it before. The Dutch churches also hold large real estate property (besides their churches), which they also lease. Other religious organizations probably also hold real estate.

The Constitution of Mexico contains an article limiting the real estate to be held by any religious organization to the places in use for worship. The political experience of the world is against religious societies holding real estate. Those churches that hold such real estate as above referred to should be compelled to dispose of it. Unless a stop can be put to the accumulation of real estate by religious organizations, I do not see why this country will not at some future day be obliged to resort to confiscation, as other nations have been, to get rid of the power arising from their wealth.

Yours, WILLIAM GREEN.

SUPERFLUOUS "IFS."

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., Dec. 25, 1873.

EDITOR INDEX:—

I find that in advocating your side of the question of free-will you are constantly using such expressions as, "man could if he would," "he might if he would," "he might if he had only thought," &c. Now, if you please, leave out your ifs, and tell us what he could have done without them. Remember that the ifs you put in were not there when he acted.

E. L. CRANE.

["Would" means "willed." To say that man could, if he would, is to say that man could, if he willed. Have we ever said that man could, if he did not will? Mr. Crane wants us to confess that man cannot act at all without willing to act. Very well: we confess it. But what of it? What has this confession to do with the question whether man, when he does will, wills freely or by necessity? We fear that our acute correspondent has discovered a logical mare's-nest.—ED.]

MORE ACTIVITY WANTED.

The activity of the Free Religious Association, as well as that of the Liberal Leagues, is a very limited one. There is no doubt that with a proper policy they could increase in number very rapidly, and the power they would exercise on the minds of our country, and even beyond it, would be very great. The activity they exercise at present is of a very inefficient kind. To do the right work we must have one, two, or three of the best lecturers in the field, who ought to preach the new "gospel" in every large city or important place. Let them establish there auxiliary leagues or associations, and let these by free gifts pay the new "evangelists." There is such a great hospitality among our citizens that these lecturers will be welcome under the roof of almost any man who shares their enthusiasm for liberty. In our city are hundreds who share the same opinions with THE INDEX; but they are not acquainted with each other. I do not know personally, for example, a single one who is a subscriber here to THE INDEX.

Ten years ago there used to be a Universalist church here, which existed but a few years. At present, with a population twice as large as then, it must be evident to every clear mind that material enough is to be found among a population of forty thousand to keep in a flourishing state a Liberal League. But why not unite the Leagues with the Free Religious Association? Their object is the same. Union makes strong. Can men of large minds and ideas not drop their littleness? Men who do not love the propagation of their ideas should be consistent, and deliberate and preach those ideas within closed doors. Let us start this movement aright. With a proper policy we can accomplish in one year more than in ten years with your passive policy. Let Boston take the lead! And, above all things, remember that the attachment of the masses of the people to the existing Christian churches is mostly brought about by the assistance of these churches to their members in their struggle for life. LUDWIG.

EVANSVILLE, Ind.

[1. The employment of lecturers or agents in the field is not easy to secure. It requires men and money, both of which are lacking. When liberals care enough for their ideas to work and give as the churches do, both will be forthcoming.

2. The objects of the Free Religious Association and the Liberal League are not identical. The one exists to disseminate and develop ideas, whether by conventions, lecture-courses, or publications; all these means it actively uses. The other exists to apply these same ideas; but it is still too young and feeble to have many results to show. Yet the present agitation of the church-taxation question, and the vigorous efforts now making all over the country to abolish church-exemption, are in no small measure due to the exertions of the Liberal Leagues. The two organizations naturally attract different classes of minds,—the one predominantly reflective, the other predominantly executive. Neither would thrive by attempting the other's work; but they ought to strengthen each other by hearty coöperation and sympathy. In the course of time this natural connection will be recognized, and then the influence of each organization will be greatly increased. Meanwhile let us patiently wait, and work for either or both as we find outward opportunity and inward impulse.—ED.]

"THE RISING FAITH."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

So much pleasure have I derived from reading Dr. Bartol's Rising Faith that I wish other readers of THE INDEX to share it with me.

Free Religion daily gathers to its ranks many who have felt their old faith slipping away, and yet are a little uncertain where the next step will lead them.

Like the clear bugle notes in the heat and smoke of battle, this call to rally will have a grateful sound to many.

Dr. Bartol's unwavering faith in an infinite, overruling Power will send a thrill of admiration even through his opponents; for his attitude reminds one of Fitz James when he hurls defiance at Sir Roderick:—

> "His back against a rock he bore,
> And firmly placed his foot before;
> 'Come one, come all! This rock shall fly
> From its firm base as soon as I.'"

And yet Dr. Bartol meets objections in no dogmatic spirit. "Atheism professed is only rejection of some definition," he tells us, and he welcomes the true scientist. "All hail to advancing science, for the sake of the wonder and worship whose breath it insures. The larger and brighter the circle, the more vast and firm its edge."

Yet the Positivist and old Orthodoxy, he thinks, are closely related: "Popular religion fights positive science. It is a family quarrel. They are blood relations. Their grounds are the same outward assumptions. Positivists declare the senses and understanding to be the only sources of knowledge. But in what does Orthodox or so-called Liberal religion repose but the letter, the sensible phenomena—ordinary or miraculous does not signify,—for it is the same outward foundation, and their reproaches remind us of creatures that growl and spit at each other because they are of the same species and in the same mood."

In the chapter on "The Secret Power," he says: "Brown-Séquard, perhaps the most eminent dissector of the material part of animal and man, affirms in the mind a secret power, superior to our understanding, to guide our course and solve our doubts. He says questions have been suddenly answered by it, which he had argumentatively striven with in vain; that it had stopped him in his discourse to his class with its suggestions on a quite different matter, so that they were surprised at his trance."

The reader will not fail to gather from the book that inspiration and revelation are perpetual, coming to man as rapidly and clearly as the mind is unfolded to receive. How welcome is the rising faith in the truth to the many who have been taught that the book of revelation was closed! "How are we hurt," says Dr. Bartol, "by the notion of God's rest on the seventh day, doing nothing since the world was made, and after Hebrew and Christian canon was closed unable to open his mouth!"

The seers, then, are the attendants of all ages, uttering the fulness of their time—all that their finiteness can grasp; and hence those utterances tinctured with error. Yet, often far in advance of their age, their inspirations are a sealed book until their meaning is disclosed by the inspirations of a later age.

David evidently was at work on the theory of evolution and development when he declared that his substance was seen long before it was perfected in form, and that in the book of Nature all his "members were written, which in continuance of time were fashioned," etc.

Our duty to bring forth the light that is in us is well expressed by Dr. Bartol: "Bring no bushel to hide your light! Utter all your wisdom, as Jesus did. Its superiority to common apprehension will, like an electric battery, guard itself from general touch or vulgar abuse."

And here is a touch of the old faith which is not eclipsed by the new, and which I for one hope never will be: "As I throw my reins on my horse's neck in the dark and trust his instinct for the way, so I yield myself gently, without wish or bias, to the power that directs. Its range of advice is greater than we suspect."

Surely, this kind of faith goeth not out with prayer or fasting!

The light will come as we push on. The more we learn of the laws of universal Nature, the more can we place ourselves in harmony with the methods of the Infinite One. There is a power over us we feel, but cannot define. Let us not be too positive, but "recognize the infinity of the unknown," and perhaps the unknowable.

Rejecting old definitions and pictures of Deity, is not the Rising Faith a purer and a brighter, albeit we cannot find words for our new conceptions?

THE "DRED SCOTT DECISION."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—In the interesting communication from Professor Newman on "The Rights of Animals," there is a reference to the Dred Scott decision which is incorrect. The declaration to which he refers as "the celebrated verdict against Dred Scott" was not a "verdict," which the Professor is doubtless aware is the finding of a jury, but was made by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, to which the case had been carried for review, in delivering the opinion of that court. Nor was the decision against Dred Scott, but in his favor. The Chief Justice took occasion to sketch the history of the African slave trade as prosecuted by so large a part of Christendom, including England, and, at length, America. In speaking of the ideas then entertained of the victims of this execrable traffic, he said, and said truly, that they were regarded as having "no rights which the white man was bound to respect." At that time the anti-slavery press of this country was very violent and unscrupulous in its denunciations, and this observation of the Chief Justice was eagerly seized upon and misrepresented as a dogma promulgated by him.

If Professor Newman would like to see the official report of the case of Dred Scott, I think a barrister can show it to him. Perhaps he may think it worth while to correct this injurious misrepresentation, and in some form which will enlighten a multitude of his countrymen who are laboring under the same mistake.

WHICH CUSTOM SHALL I OBSERVE?

MR. EDITOR:—

Thursday, the 25th day of the present month, will be religiously observed by many as the guess-day of the birth of Jesus of Nazareth: which reminds me of a memorandum I made at the time of the delivery of one Dr. Solger's lectures before the Lowell Institue in 1858.

After referring to the various forms of ancient worship, he thus alluded to their later and most prominent deities:—

"Under Aurelian a new deity rose to a first place in the Pantheon, and maintained itself true to the end—the Sun Invincible: that is, the sun which ever triumphs over night and winter. He combined the attributes of all the other chief divinities. The Sun's birthday was celebrated on the 25th of December, that being the shortest day. While he was worshipped by the emperors, the people preferred Persian Mithras, called also the Mediator. His birthday was, also, on the 25th of December, and towards the last of the empire, he was one of the most popular divinities. All over the empire his monuments have been found. The worship is remarkable for many of its rites and ideas being like those of Christianity. Not only was the divinity a mediator, but the idea of atonement prevailed, with rites of baptism, the last supper, and the symbol of resurrection. He was called the Incomprehensible, the Omnipotent, and the Beginning of all Life and of all Salvation."

PALEY AND DARWIN.

"And this also I ask: If this expanse of heaven, which we see, was constructed by the gradual concurrence of atoms, how did it not collapse while it was in construction, if indeed the yawning top of the structure was not propped and bound by any stays? For as those who build circular domes, unless they bind the fastening of the central top, the whole falls at once; so also the circle of the sky which we see brought together in so graceful a form, if it was not made at once. . . . by the power (and intelligence) of a Creator, but by atoms gradually concurring and constructing it, ... how did it not fall down and crumble to pieces before it could be brought together and fastened?"—Clements' brother, Niceta, speaking for the Apostle Peter at a mass meeting at Laodicea: Recognitions of Clement, VIII., 18.

This is a sample of the reasoning in support of the Christian "design argument," during the last half of the second century. The argument, as given by the Pseudo-Clement, is built on ignorance. The various illustrations he cites in its support—"all which attest the hand of a Maker, and show the operation of reason, which reason I call the Word, and God"—vanish like fog before the sun at the touch of modern chemistry, physics, astronomy, &c.

But if we go back about seventy years, instead of seventeen hundred, we still find the design argument founded on ignorance. The celebrated "watch argument," in the Natural Theology of William Paley (which he borrowed in the main without acknowledgment from an older Dutch work), manifests the slightest possible acquaintance with the science of geology, which has since grown to such grand proportions.

Mr. Paley [V., 4] says it may be objected to his argument that all the "organized bodies which we see are only so many out of the possible varieties and combinations of being which the lapse of infinite ages has brought into existence; that the present world is the relic of that variety; millions of other bodily forms and other species having perished, being by the defect of their constitution incapable of preservation, or of continuance by generation."

In his utter ignorance of the facts now grouped under geology, natural selection, &c., Mr. Paley says: "There is no foundation whatever for this conjecture . . . . No such energy operates as that which is here supposed, and which should be constantly pushing into existence new varieties of being. . . . Upon the supposition here stated, we should see unicorns and mermaids, sylphs and centaurs, the fancies of painters, and the fables of poets, realized by examples." Why not see them on Mr. Paley's theory? Why not have angels, for instance, to fly through the air as well as eagles and bats?

"We might, at least," he adds, "have nations of human beings without nails upon their fingers, with more or fewer fingers and toes than ten; some with one eye, others with one ear, with one nostril, or without the sense of smelling at all," &c., &c.

Just as the Pseudo-Clement supposes the sky must have tumbled down in the building, so Mr. Paley thinks the animal world must have been a chaos of discordant forms, had it not been for the mechanical skill of Deity. He does not stop to inquire whether any other causes tend to produce the adaptations we see in Nature; he has supposed a designer who contrived everything, and he sets down this supposition as knowledge. He thinks [V., 7] the proofs of this "ought not to be shaken, . . . by bringing forward to our view our own ignorance, or rather the general imperfection of our knowledge of Nature." With a wonderful self-complacency Mr. Paley adds: "True fortitude of the understanding consists in not suffering what we know to be disturbed by what we do not know."

How different this assurance from the modesty of Mr. Darwin, who, after piling up facts that Mr. Paley never dreamed of mountain high, cautions his readers again and again that, since our ignorance of the whole subject "is so profound," we ought not to be too positive in our conclusions!

But there is another difference. Mr. Paley merely rehashed an argument which is as old as ignorance,—stole it, moreover, from a work which had been published nearly a hundred years. But Mr. Darwin toiled patiently in the fresh fields of Nature a quarter of a century, and discovered—not a new species or genus of animals merely, but "a new idea, a new genus of thought," which groups all the species that live, or that have lived, in a system of classification at once natural and intelligible. The intellect of the present century was hungering and thirsting after the idea of "Variation and Natural Selection," and it is the imperishable glory of Mr. Darwin that he was foremost in supplying the great want. The idea was needed, not only to account for the origin, triumph, and extinction of species of plants and animals, but of nations, languages, religions, governments, and systems of thought. According to Mr. Darwin's theory, they were all evolved out of pre-existing species, by the same forces and by the same insensible steps of transition as those we see operating to-day. And if, as Mr. Darwin supposes, whole races were brought forward together, in the process of modification by Variation and Selection, the steps must have been so insensible that they would no more be visible to us than the growth of a forest tree is visible to an insect that lives but an hour.

Is it possible to conceive of any other origin for any visible animal, except the well-known one of physical generation? Can we realize in thought the origin of a being having organs by either "special creation" or "spontaneous generation"? Sour-krout never brings forth lizards. An "atom of matter" must be infinitely small, and it seems to me that the chain stretching from the smallest visible monad down to inorganic matter, must have as many millions of links as that reaching from the mammals of our day to the lowest Silurian worm.

It is a pity Mr. Darwin's theory is so imperfectly understood, even by many of Mr. Darwin's friends.

J. W. PIKE.

VINELAND, N. J., Dec. 12, 1873.

IT IS CHARGED that a confidence game has been played by certain clergymen and laymen of the Methodist Conference of Wisconsin upon their brethren. The accusation is that the stock of the Monitor Silver Mining Company, formed at Milwaukee three years since, with a capital of $1,000,000, to operate in California, has been recommended and sold to the Methodist clergy and laity throughout the State by three or four leading ministers, upon promises which they must have known were false. The Conference in session at Whitewater last month appointed a committee of investigation to look into the matter, and we learn that one or two prominent ministers have been suspended on the strength of the committee's report.—Baraboo (Wis.) Republic.

THE TWO "ANTI-EXEMPTION PETITIONS."

CONGRESSIONAL PETITION.

Copies of the subjoined petition will be sent from THE INDEX Office to any address, on receipt of a three cent postage stamp. All interested in the repeal of the Act of Congress designated will please circulate this petition for signatures; and all lists returned to THE INDEX will be acknowledged in its columns.—ED.

We, the undersigned, citizens and residents of the United States, would hereby respectfully petition your honorable bodies to repeal the first section of the Act approved June 17, 1870, entitled "An Act exempting from taxes certain property in the District of Columbia," etc., and providing that "all churches and school-houses, and all buildings, grounds and property appurtenant thereto, and used in connection therewith, in the District of Columbia, shall be exempt from any and all taxes and assessments, national, municipal or county." We ask this for the following reasons:—

1. This part of said Act we understand to be at variance with the spirit, if not the letter, of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." Since the exemption from taxation of churches, parsonages, ecclesiastical houses and sectarian schools in the District of Columbia is precisely equivalent in effect to a direct appropriation by Congress for their support, we conceive this measure to violate what all the expounders of the Constitution declare to have been its manifest intent and design,—namely, to sever all religious organizations from any connection with or dependence upon the civil government, except for equal and impartial protection. This part of said Act, therefore, we consider to be UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

2. This part of said Act we conceive to be also contrary to equity and justice, inasmuch as its effect is to increase our relative proportion of the National taxes, to the end of relieving altogether from taxation certain churches and church properties in the District of Columbia. We consider it, therefore, to be UNJUST.

3. All history shows that the effect of exempting churches from taxation is to accumulate property in the hands of ecclesiastical bodies to a very dangerous extent, and at last to compel resort to confiscation as the only means of escaping the great evils thus generated. The examples of England, of Italy, and of Mexico, of Spain, Austria, and France, are sufficient warnings against adopting a policy which is hostile to American ideas and American institutions. That the non-taxation of church property is tending to the same results here as elsewhere is evident from the fact that, while the number of church-members in the United States was not doubled between 1850 and 1870, the value of church property during the same period was quadrupled, advancing from $87,328,801 to $354,483,581. At the same rate, its value in 1890 will be over $1,418,000,000; and such rapid accumulation of wealth in ecclesiastical hands is most perilous to civil and religious liberty. This part of said Act, therefore, we consider to be UNSAFE.

For the reasons, consequently, that this part of said Act is unconstitutional, unjust, and unsafe, we respectfully ask that it be forthwith repealed.

MASSACHUSETTS PETITION.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in General Court Assembled:—

We, the undersigned, voters and tax-payers of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, respectfully represent—

1. That under the laws of this Commonwealth persons can readily incorporate themselves into so-called Religious, Educational, Scientific, Literary, Benevolent, and Charitable associations, and as such hold large amounts of property exempt from taxation.

2. That the exemption of such associations from taxation is practically taxation of the rest of the community for their support; which is to increase unduly and unjustly the taxes of all other property-holders.

3. That this exemption from taxation has come to be so large and valuable a gratuity, that many such corporations are formed unnecessarily, for the purpose of holding property untaxed until such time as the corporation shall wish to divide the same.

4. That this exemption in the case of religious societies, instead of promoting the interests of pure religion, or subserving any public end, stimulates the various sects to multiply such incorporations unnecessarily, solely for the purpose of competing more successfully with each other be increasing sectarian wealth and power.

5. That no State support to such corporations should be given either directly or indirectly; but that, if given at all, it should be given by direct appropriation, to the end that the people may know the amounts, and to what uses the public money is really put.

6. That the exemption complained of is frequently used to cover large amounts of property which are not intended to be legally exempt,—thus increasing the taxes of the poor for the benefit of the rich.

7. And that therefore your petitioners pray that the third, seventh, and ninth clauses of section five of chapter eleven of the General Statutes—being those parts of the Statutes which provide for the aforesaid objectionable exemption—together with all special acts of like purport, be repealed.

NOTE.—Ladies signing this petition will please write under the head of "Remarks" not a voter. If also a tax-payer, write taxed.

Lists of signatures to this petition should be returned as speedily as possible to the "Boston Liberal League, 1 Tremont Place, Boston."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

BUST OF

THEODORE PARKER,

BY

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Mr. Sidney H. Morse's new bust of Theodore Parker elicits warm commendation from all who are able to judge fairly of its merits. After long absence, so deeply felt by the thoughtful minds and generous movements of the age, those familiar features have reappeared, in a form that must perpetuate their functions as household treasure and public inspiration. For it is safe to predict that the meaning of this counterpart of the living man will keep pace with his growing fame, and bear successfully the tests of time. No presentment of him so genuine and real has before been given, and none more satisfactory is likely to be given hereafter. It is American in the noblest sense, and the American people, I am confident, will hasten to appreciate and cherish it.

It is not the least of our artist's triumphs that he has invested this head, moulded on a scale of only three-quarters the life size, with such apparent massiveness and real power, through the fine proportionality of each element to the sum of all, and to the unitary expression of real character, as well as through the vitality of the spirit that inspheres and animates the whole. If placed at that moderate height above the observer required by its scale of size, every aspect has a special fidelity; and those who look for the different sides of Parker's genius will not tire of recognizing the diversity. Prophet and scholar, enthusiast and patient worker in details, builder of right and scourge of wrong, ready helper, genial humorist, loyal and tender friend, reverent lover of ideal and actual truth and good,—all are suggested in this marvellous reproduction with surprising fulness and force.—Samuel Johnson.

The usual temptation is to give a classic tone to a bust, though all the model Greeks are dead long ago, and their contour is not likely to be reproduced in Lexington. Mr. Parker was born there, a genuine New England man. He never looked like Sophocles, Aristotle or Homer. There was a curious reminiscence of the homely and insignificant nose of Socrates, and something too in the outline of the head. Mr. Morse neither flatters nor extenuates. He has made the living Parker as he was in moments of repose. Old friends can easily re-locate the tenderness which transpired in the corners of the lips, or the moral protest which brought them out before the tide of his speech.—John Weiss.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak, then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished in plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX, and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent, that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality.

With the Hope

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also, that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished.

"The Unitarians never had so good a paper as THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER is now. Mr. Mumford has the true editorial faculty, and makes a capital reading paper."—Springfield Republican.

"THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER—the Unitarian paper published in this city—shows every week that dulness is not a necessary accompaniment of a people who build mainly on a literature. The vivacity and humor which make THE REGISTER welcome to the 'masses' would have been thought something quite unseemly in the days of Channing and Ware. Its columns are liberally flavored with the best kind of nature, which, always and everywhere, is human nature."—Universalist.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

YOUR cunning rascal overreaches nobody but himself. He who steals does but steal the small-pox.

THE FIRST Catholic church for colored people ever built in Cincinnati was recently dedicated by Archbishop Purcell.

BISHOP MCNIERNY confirmed 1,050 persons in the Church of the Immaculate Conception, in New York, Nov. 29. The Catholics obey the original injunction to "increase and multiply."

REV. MR. SPELLMAN, a colored barber, is now a successful New York minister, and has over a thousand communicants in his church (Baptist). The razor has been thrown aside for the "sword of the Spirit."

THE Liberal Christian, of New York, is changed to a sixteen-page journal, and shows many marks of improvement. Dr. Bellows' editorials are always well worth reading, whether approved or not.

THE Investigator of Jan. 7 publishes the address of Col. R. G. Ingersoll, so warmly praised when delivered in Chicago. It handles the Church without mittens, is witty even to the verge of audacity, and contains many admirable things without always making just discriminations.

"HE WHO STANDS with irksome repetitions asking people to "come to Jesus," says Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, "while he gives no strong common-sense reason why they should come, drives back the souls of men." The cause of the population's tardiness in starting on the proposed journey is the impossibility of discovering any "common-sense reason" for taking it.

THE QUESTION of furnishing religious instructors to the inmates of public institutions is agitating the city government of Boston,—the Catholics demanding a Catholic chaplain for their fellow-believers. "No question is ever settled that is not settled right;" and the only way to settle this is to relieve the government of the duty of supporting chaplains of any kind.

IN MEXICO, Catholic rioters not long ago beat Volero, the Protestant leader, at Meatepa, and left him for dead. They burned alive the Alcalde of Auguagno, and were only suppressed by government troops. The old Church keeps its old spirit wherever it gets control. Is it worth while to exempt its property from taxation, and thereby put power into its hands to burn alive those whom it first plunders by unjust privileges?

REV. JAMES H. HEALEY told the Boston Catholic Union on Nov. 14 that, while there were in all New England only 3 priests and 8 churches in 1825, there are to-day 6 Bishops, 441 priests, 432 churches, and nearly 1,000,000 Catholics; and the Hon. P. A. Collins told them that "there are those here to-night who once knelt in the only Catholic church in Boston, and saw its four small mortgaged rooms contain our entire Catholic population." Is there no lesson for liberals in such statements?

THE NEW YORK papers recently displayed the following advertisement, inserted by a Protestant Episcopal Church: "Prayer for the Holy Dead will be said and the blessed sacrament administered to-morrow (Thursday) at 8 o'clock, at the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, West Forty-fifth Street, near Broadway." What is the use of praying for the "Holy Dead"? One would suppose it was the unholy dead that stood most in need of prayers. But this is "one of the things that no fellow can find out," as Lord Dundreary remarks.

FROM FAR-OFF Nebraska has just come a racy letter from which we make some extracts: "I believe I am the only subscriber to THE INDEX in this place at present; I may get some others to subscribe. Our town is almost all church-bigoted; so you see I have a pretty lonely time of it. I called our three ministers to visit me at my office a couple or weeks ago to talk over our different ideas, when we read the 'Demands of Liberalism,' which were discussed pretty fully by the three divines,—one of whom has been reading my INDEX for some time. . . . He complimented Frothingham's 'Religious Outlook in America' very highly; and he visits me quietly almost every week to talk over matters. This is Mr. ——, our Lutheran man. Mr. —— (Methodist) boasts of being liberal, and does accord heartily with the first 'Demand.' But poor bigoted S. P. V. becomes rampant. Here let me give you an item. We got up a little dance for Christmas night, and extended our invitations quite freely, and among others to our three ministers. Mr. Presiding Elder V. aforesaid returned his card of invitation to the Committee with the following indorsement written on the back of it: 'May God Almighty curse the imposition, and the impostor of the same! S. P. V.' I do wish I had your personal acquaintance; but please accept me as one of your non-Christian brothers."

A THOUGHTFUL notice of John Stuart Mill in the Cleveland Leader, in which we find much to admire, has this sentence: "Beneath the external calm of acute discriminations and intellectually accurate statements, there is a glow of feeling—a morality of an exquisite quality and of a subtile and penetrating power—a morality which makes, by comparison, a partisan fidelity seem coarse and selfish, devotion to a 'cause' one-sided, partial, and mean, and the ordinary religious zeal cheap and pernicious." If by "devotion to a 'cause'" is meant devotion to a wise general movement, either of thought or of practical reform, we must dissent from the view which regards it as "one-sided, partial and mean;" for a noble and comprehensive humanity always dedicates itself with enthusiasm to the universal, and scorns to isolate its sympathies in proud or selfish seclusion from the common interests of mankind. Of this great-hearted self-consecration to the universal, moreover, no more conspicuous or beautiful illustration can be found than the career of John Stuart Mill, whose whole life was a battle for the "cause" of truth and social progress. But if the writer had in mind the partisan advocacy of narrow ideas or measures, incapable of promoting the universal welfare, we most cordially agree with him. The miserable cant which we sometimes hear about "the cause," and the insolent attempts to subjugate all minds to its support which mark the utterances of some reformers, deserve the epithets above quoted, and even harsher ones. We all need to learn the lesson of reverence for the freedom of the very humanity which we seek to educate and enlighten. Not even the "kingdom of heaven" shall be established by "violence."

The Soul of Protestantism.

FIRST LECTURE IN THE COURSE OF "SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES," GIVEN IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, BOSTON, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, JANUARY 4, 1874.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The subject of this lecture is "The Soul of Protestantism;" by which I mean the essence of Protestantism, its cardinal idea and principle. This is not so simple a thing to get at as people commonly imagine. They who think they have it fast locked up in the phrases, "an open Bible," "freedom of conscience," "liberty of private judgment," "spiritual emancipation," or other popular phrase, are gravely mistaken. Such will probably be surprised to learn that some of the deepest scholars and hardest thinkers of Germany, where the Protestant Reformation began, where its genius was native, and its spirit should be most easily caught, have written bulky books to show what the soul of Protestantism was; and so little agree in their descriptions of it that their chief strength is expended in correcting, criticising and refuting one another. A glance at three or four learned articles by first-rate men, in the Theologische Jahrbücher, will satisfy the incredulous of the extreme difficulty of saying precisely what Protestantism was or is.

Men protested long before Martin Luther; but Protestantism, as a solid movement in Christendom, began with him. It was no new thing for the Church of Rome to be assailed. Malcontents had had their fling at her for two hundred years and more. Wyclyffe in England, Huss and Jerome in Bohemia, Savonarola in Italy, had said their say,—paid dearly for the luxury, to be sure, but spoken, nevertheless, and been heard. Eminent men in Catholic universities had dealt hard blows at the papacy. The Church was used to complaint, fault-finding, and opposition from her children. She felt secure and good-natured, and let the malcontents wrangle on and devour one another. The great popes sat securely on their throne, suspecting no new danger. The patient old world was wonted to their ways. The cavillers had said their worst, and, as for doing anything, the power was not in their hands. The elegant Leo X. accepts from the mighty Julius II. the duty of rebuilding St. Peter's Church. Michael Angelo laid before him his plan of hanging the dome of the Pantheon three hundred feet in the air, and filling in the space between the dome and the earth with an architecture that should do justice to the conceptions of his colossal brain. The imagination of Leo was enchanted, but his exchequer was low. Angelo was not a cheap builder. Good architecture was never cheap. He planned for no earthly monarch, but for the Vicar of Christ, who was supposed to have at command the treasures of invisible kingdoms. For such building even the Pope was poor; the Roman State was poor. The rights to the Church in France had been sold to Francis I., but the price paid by a king for a national church left but a scanty allowance for the celestial design. Thirty new cardinals were created, each at a handsome sum. Still the treasury of holiness was empty. The terrestrial sources of revenue being exhausted, the celestial remained. We must see what treasures were laid up in heaven. Tetzel, a Dominican monk, is commissioned to offer seats in paradise to the highest bidder. With boundless impudence, partly constitutional, partly official, and partly the result of confidence in the bottomless credulity of the German people, he offers his goods publicly in churches, public squares and taverns, with huge parade. The market was fair, and for a time a smart traffic went on to the great content of the Dominican order, which pocketed a handsome commission, and the rapid accumulation of Peter's pence. But as the goods became shop-worn, the tradesman had to fall back on his eloquence, which was of the auctioneer's quality, not refined; he insinuated, he ranted, he cried up his wares in the most approved style of the auction block, peppered and sugared his lies, drew on his fancy for inducements, threw sulphur and turpentine at discretion into the hell-fires, burnished up his tarnished images of felicity, increased the number of penalties to be compounded for, swelled the list of sins to a ruinous dimension, multiplied the candidates for perdition, caught people figuratively by the hair of the head, held them over the pit, and, when they writhed and screamed in terror, quietly remarked, "Well, the door of escape is open; pay the price, cash down, and you are free."

A prospectus of these public sales, signed and guaranteed by the Archbishop of Mentz, whom the Pope had made superintendent of the saintly lottery, fell under the eye of the monk Luther. He was struck with amazement, but not dumb. A remonstrance to his own Bishop of Brandenburg had no effect. The bishop merely advised him to hold his tongue, or he might get himself into trouble. A respectful remonstrance addressed to the Archbishop of Mentz, accompanied by a list of propositions which he offered to maintain against Tetzel and his practices, brought no reply; and on the 31st of October, 1517, the indignant monk nailed a copy of the propositions to the church door of Wittemberg Castle. The propositions are too many to quote here in full. Here a few of them:—

"Christians should be taught that, if the Pope were made acquainted with the extortions of the indulgence preachers, he would prefer seeing the basilica of St. Peter's reduced to ashes to building it with the flesh, fleece, and bones of his sheep."

"The Pope's wish must be, if indulgences, a small matter, are proclaimed with the ringing of bell, with ceremonial and solemnity, that the Gospel, so great a matter should be preached with a hundred bells, a hundred ceremonials, a hundred solemnities."

"The true treasure of the Church is the sacrosanct Gospel of the glory and grace of God."

"People are given cause to hate this treasure of the Gospel, by which the first became last."

"People are given cause to love the treasure of indulgences, by which the last became first."

"The treasures of the Gospel are the nets by which the rich were once fished for."

"The treasures of indulgences are the nets with which men's riches are now fished for."

"To say that the cross placed in the Pope's army is equal to the cross of Christ is blasphemy."

"Why does not the Pope, out of his most holy charity, empty Purgatory, in which are so many souls in punishment? This would be a worthier exercise of his power than freeing souls for money, and to what end? To build a church!"

"What means this strange compassion on the part of God and the Pope, who, for money's sake, change the soul of the impious, of God's enemy, into a soul pious and acceptable to the Lord?"

"Cannot the Pope, whose treasures, at the present moment, exceed the most enormous treasures, build a single church with his own money, without taking that of the faithful poor?"

"Christians should be exhorted to follow Christ, their head, through pains, punishments, and hell itself; so that they may have assurance that heaven is entered through tribulations, not through security and peace."

In all this we see moral indignation blasting hot, the lava stream of a volcanic heart—nothing more. But more soon followed. Straight on the heels of the propositions came the dogmatic theses and the bold sermon in the vulgar tongue supporting them:—

"Man by his nature cannot will that God be God. He would rather himself be God, and that God were not."

"It is false that appetite is free to choose both ways; it is not free, but captive."

"There exists in Nature, before God, nothing save unclean desire."

"It is false that this desire can be regulated by the virtue of hope. For hope is opposed to charity, which seeks and desires only what is of God. Hope comes not of our merits, but of our passions, which efface our merits."

"The best, the only infallible preparation and disposition for the reception of grace are the choice and predestination of God from all eternity."

"It is false that invincible ignorance is any extenuation. Ignorance of God, of oneself, of good works, is the invincible nature of man."

This was the doctrinal basis on which the protest of conscience rested. The people leaped upon it, as if it had been the Rock of Ages. A thrill of conviction ran through them. The German mind seemed about to slide off in a mass from Italy. The propositions were printed by myriads; like falling leaves scattered by the wind, they lodged everywhere, in back-yard, on door-step and window-sill. Luther trembled at his own success. He wrote to the Pope: "Most Holy Father, I cast myself at your feet, with the offer of myself and all that is in me. Pronounce the sentence of life or death; call, recall, approve, disapprove; I acknowledge your voice to be the voice of Christ, who reigns and speaks in you." He protested that he advanced no heretical doctrine.

The story of Luther's battle with himself and the Pope does not belong here. We are concerned with Protestantism, and but incidentally with its founder. On the 10th of December, 1520, at the ninth hour of the day, at the east gate of Wittemberg, near the holy cross, the Pope's bull of excommunication, along with other of the Pope's books, was publicly burned. By that act the reformer destroyed his ships, and strode forward resolutely to his life-battle, while Europe entered on the career of controversy which soon resulted in blood.

The enthusiasm of all classes for the new religion was boundless. "Nobles and people, castles and free towns, rivalled each other in zeal and enthusiasm for Luther." His popular tracts were devoured; the sheets wet from the press were hurried to the shops and carried off at almost the same instant. The printers seemed to be disciples of the reformer to a man. They printed with the greatest care, and sometimes at their own expense, the writings that favored his cause, while the Romanists found difficulty in getting anything done, had to pay dearly for it, and obtained the poorest work even then. Not a few monks caught the fury and became colporteurs for Luther. The enemy tried desperately to stem the tide, by sowing dissensions among the German principalities, and so dividing the Protestant strength; and they succeeded so far that, in 1529, the German Diet took measures to check the movement. Then it was that a minority of the delegates remonstrated, and, remonstrance being of no avail, PROTESTED. Hence the name PROTESTANTS. So much of external history must suffice.

Now the careful thinker asks two questions:—

I. Against what was the protest made?

II. In the name of what was the protest made?

Against what? Against the right of a majority to dictate to a minority in matters of faith; against outward compulsion in concerns of religion, whether from State or Church; against spiritual dominion of all kinds. The protesting members declared their willingness to obey the emperor in all fitting duty till death; "but these are matters that concern God's honor and the salvation of souls, and we are bound to regard Him as King and God, King of kings, and Lord of lords; and, being so bound, by baptism and by his holy word, we must consult that honor and that salvation, each one standing alone, and giving account of himself. Once for all they declare that they cannot with good conscience obey in all things the emperor, since they should falsify themselves in sight of God, were they to influence any of high or low degree to depart from the commandment of God's holy word, and bow to a lower authority. And as for the authority of the Church to interpret God's word, it would be time enough to speak of that when they were all agreed on which was the true, holy Church of Christ. But inasmuch as on one point there is not the least controversy,—as no precept is plainer than the command to stand fast by God's word,—as the holy Scripture is clear on all essential points to Christian men,—we are minded, God helping and instructing, to abide by it, to heed what is contained in the holy gospel of the Old and New Testaments, and to heed nothing else; for, in thus observing the one rule of truth, and conforming to the only just standard of doctrine and life, no one can err or go astray; whoever builds thereon will prevail against the gates of hell; but they that build upon human edicts must come to naught."

The protest, therefore, was against every kind of outward interference in matters of faith.

In what name was the protest made? In the name of CONSCIENCE. In the early reform literature there is no more frequent word than the word "conscience." Luther used it repeatedly. His followers used it; it occurs many times in the appeal which the minority made, and the pith of which I have just condensed. But what did these men mean by conscience? In raising this question, we touch the heart of our subject. The soul of Protestantism was respect for conscience as the kernel of moral personality. That was the seat of authority within, as the Church for the Romanists was the seat of authority without. That was the organ of faith as the Church had been the organ of faith; the only organ there was to oppose to the Church. The external power must be supplanted by an internal power. As Rome was objective, Protestantism must be subjective. In the name of conscience, Savonarola pronounced Pope Alexander an atheist, and called on Catholic Christendom to depose him; in the name of conscience, Luther declared Leo a blasphemer, and called on Christendom at large to throw off his yoke. Both reformers arrayed conscience against the hierarchy which, combining with state-craft, crushed religion; but neither arrayed conscience against the religion thus abused. Savonarola called himself a Catholic of Catholics, and Luther called himself a Christian of Christians. Both appealed to a new attestation of faith; neither detracted from the substance of faith. It was to save the substance that they changed the representation. It is, at least, a rhetorical exaggeration to say, as George Bancroft does: "Luther based his reform upon the simple but sublime truth which lies at the basis of morals—the paramount value of character and purity of conscience; the superiority of right dispositions over ceremonial exactness." Neither Luther nor his friends took so natural a view of justification as this.

By conscience they meant what we mean by the "Christian consciousness," the "mind of Christ" that had been imparted by grace and by inheritance. Not the natural conscience; not the human moral sense; not the impulse, or the persuasion, or the conviction of right; of the natural conscience, as of other things natural, Luther had the most despicable opinion. The function of the natural conscience was simply to convict people of sin. It was no oracle, unless it were of condemnation. It revealed nothing but iniquity; it proclaimed nothing but doom. In appealing to conscience, Protestantism appealed to no human power, but to an authority above humanity, on which humanity was absolutely dependent, before which humanity must devoutly kneel. The conscience of the believer, the conscience enlightened and renewed by grace, furnished the new point of immediate spiritual contact with God. But the conscience of the unbeliever rendered no such divine service. What respect had Luther for the consciences of the poor peasants who, getting an inkling of natural human rights from the Bible, and interpreting justice by the awakened feeling of their hearts, rose in insurrection against their brutal lords? "I am of opinion that all the peasants ought to perish, rather than the princes and magistrates, since they take up the sword without divine authority. The peasants deserve no mercy, no tolerance, but the indignation of God and man." "The peasants are under the ban both of God and the emperor, and may be treated as mad dogs." What consideration had Luther for the conscience of the earnest and indefatigable Carlstadt, who felt himself impelled to enter the church at Wittemberg and destroy the crucifixes, images, and altars,—who, pressing the Protestant principle, as he received it, to its results, questioned the doctrine of the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist? Carlstadt was an uncomfortable fellow, but he was a true and uncompromising reformer. Does Luther deal with him as an overzealous brother? He deals with him as a miscreant. "Pray for me, and help me to trample under foot this Satan that has arisen at Wittemberg against the Gospel, in the name of the Gospel. It will be difficult to persuade Carlstadt to give way; but Christ will constrain him, if he does not yield of himself. For we are masters of life and death, we who believe in the Master of life and death." "The spirit of the new prophets aspires to be the highest spirit, a spirit which has eaten the Holy Ghost, feathers and all. 'Bible,' they cry out; yes, Bible, Babel, Babel." What regard did Luther show for the conscience of the Anabaptists of Münster,—fanatical people who, doubtless with intentions as serious as his own, proposed to reconstruct society on what they held to be Gospel principles? "Is it not clear," he cries, "that the devil reigns at Münster in person, or rather that there is a whole troop of devils?" "When God in his wrath deprives us of his word, no deceit of the devil's is too gross. The best weapon against the devil is the sword of the Spirit, the word of God. The devil is a spirit, and laughs at cuirass, horse, and horseman. The devil keeps the hot soup in his mouth, and only mutters mum, mum. Well, devil! Mutter and spit as you list; one little word overthrows all you say."

In all this it cannot fairly be said that Luther was untrue to his principle. His principle never admitted the validity of the unregenerated conscience. In common with all the reformers who have been associated with the Protestant movement, he held as a cardinal truth the doctrine of human depravity, the vital need of supernatural grace, and the indispensable importance of faith grounded on belief, to make the grace available. There was not the faintest suspicion of Transcendentalism about them. They deemed it a holy duty to put the natural reason down. Luther, indeed, condemned resort to physical violence. He had no mind to baptize unbelievers in their own blood. "I will not," he said, "use carnal weapons to spread the Gospel." "Preach I will, talk, write; but compel I will not. For belief must be voluntary, unforced, spontaneous." Luther put his vehemence into speech; his words smote like two-edged swords; his language was a consuming fire. But the less passionate, unsympathetic, unenthusiastic Calvin burned Servetus as logically and imperturbably as Alexander burnt Savonarola, or as John burnt Huss. Toleration did not make part of the plan. It is not enough to say that they could not rise superior to the spirit of their age. They could not rise superior to their religion, and they had no wish to. Their religion was the Christianity of the Middle Ages fortified by a new guarantee.

The protest was not against doctrines, but against the external dispensation of doctrines. Could they who made it have imagined that their work would have been misunderstood as it has been, they would have remained in the Roman communion forever.

That Luther and his disciples, near and remote, should have held fast the dogmas of the orthodox faith, trinity, incarnation, atonement, fall and redemption, is not to be wondered at. How could they have done otherwise? The time for theological doubt on these questions had not come. The point to be emphasized is this: They did all they could to prevent the possibility of any such doubt. They wanted to make everything as fast as the Roman Church had made it, and faster, for they would gladly have made all things secure against a second Reformation. They had renounced one authority, but only in the hope of establishing another, equally or more stringent. They had no idea of being Godless, Christless, or churchless. Three points they insisted on:—

I. The first and cordial point was the absolute dependence of the individual on the Almighty Power, the Eternal Will, which appoints his destiny, and determines absolutely his whole life and being. The most characteristic form of Protestantism is Calvinism; but Calvin did not surpass Luther in the force with which he laid down the doctrine of predestination by the divine decrees. The iron thread of predetermined law runs through the whole system, binding reason and will in fatal bonds. Protestantism, in its essence, is the effort of the awakened soul to secure its salvation by uniting itself with the absolute cause of all blessedness, the infinite and eternal God. Luther made this central doctrine the basis of his reform, laying stress particularly on the subjection of the human will; Zwingli was attracted by the other aspect of the conception, the absolute Godhead, the divine prevision; Calvin completes the dogma by developing in full proportions the principle of the eternal decrees. No one in the least acquainted with the literature of the early Reformation has failed to observe the overshadowing importance given to this speculation, or has missed the fact that it was insisted on as a safeguard against the irruption of unregenerated nature. So long as the determining causality of God could be maintained, there was no danger from rebellion. F. C. Baur, a profound student of this whole subject, says: "That, in the entire relation between man and God, as well moral as religious, nothing proceeds from human activity, but everything from the apprehension of the saving truth to the blessed results thereof, everything depends on the unconditioned will of the absolute cause, is an essential assumption of Protestantism." Equally essential, no doubt, was the assumption of freedom. Luther laid stress enough on that, when on the ground of that freedom he defied Church and Papacy, and all spiritual wickedness in high places. But that freedom was simply freedom to respond to the inviting Savior,—freedom to embrace the Christ; as freedom with the Catholic was freedom to join the Church. Neither Catholic nor Protestant called the choice of a false religion freedom; that was slavery.

II. The next point was the immediate concourse of God, in Christ, with the human soul; immediate, without the intervention of priests; a direct, conscious, vital communion, conditioned on faith in the Redeemer. In this union, the disciple was made partaker of the renewing life as completely as was ever claimed by subject of the Papal Church. Faith was the soul's reaction on the Savior.

III. The third point, an indispensable one, was the sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, Law and Gospel. To quote Dr. Schenkel, a famous living theologian of the liberal Protestant school: "The contents of religion are in God himself; and since man is conscious of God only as God reveals himself, for man the contents of religion are in the written revelation. Most gloriously and completely has God manifested himself in the person of Christ; and the Holy Scriptures give the history of that manifestation. The Holy Scripture, as the word or revelation of God, contains the divine substance. Conscience is free; but true freedom consists in obedience to the truth. Caprice is no freedom. That only is genuinely free which is bound to God. Hence the Protestant position, while appealing to conscience, at the same time insists that conscience is bound to God's word, and can attain outside of that to nothing. It is therefore the special characteristic of Protestantism to be the religion of the Bible."

Here Schenkel, writing at Heidelberg, only ten years ago, repeats what Chillingworth said two hundred and thirty-five years ago. Chillingworth had changed from Protestant to Catholic and back again. He was now writing against the Catholics in a strain so liberal as to offend his Protestant allies: "The BIBLE, I say, the BIBLE only, is the religion of Protestants. Whatsoever else they believe beside it, and the plain, irrefragable, indubitable consequences of it, well may they hold it as matter of opinion. I, for my part, after a long and, as I readily believe and hope, impartial search of the true way to eternal happiness, do profess plainly that I cannot find any true rest for the sole of my foot but upon this rock only. Propose me anything out of this book, and require whether I believe it or no; and, seem it never so incomprehensible to human reason, I will subscribe to it with hand and heart, as knowing no demonstration can be stronger than this: God hath said so, and therefore it must be true. In other things I will take no man's liberty of judgment from him, neither shall any man take mine from me. I will think no man the worse man, nor the worse Christian. I will love no man the less for differing in opinion from me. I am fully assured that God does not, and that, therefore, men ought not to require any more of any man than this: to believe the Scripture to be God's word, to endeavor to find the true sense of it, and to live according to it."

To the objection that Protestants do not agree in their interpretations of Scripture, and therefore some of them must miss the truth and fall into error, Chillingworth replies: "The most disagreeing Protestants that are, yet thus far agree: 1. That those books of Scripture which were never doubted of in the Church are the undoubted word of God and a perfect rule of faith; 2. That the sense of them which God intended, whatsoever it is, is certainly true; so that they believe implicitly even these very truths against which they err, and why an implicit faith in Christ and his word should not suffice as well as an implicit faith in your church, I have desired to be resolved by many of your side, but never could; 3. That they are to use their best endeavors to believe the Scripture in the true sense, and to live according to it. This if they perform truly and sincerely, it is impossible but that they should believe aright in all things necessary to salvation." But the Scripture stands in need of some watchful and unerring eye to guard it. "Very true; but this is no other than the watchful eye of Divine Providence. God, requiring men to believe Scripture in its purity, engages himself to see it preserved in sufficient purity; and you need not fear but he will satisfy his engagement." And again (for I am anxious to make this position as clear as light, and no language is so frank as Chillingworth's): "The promise of Divine assistance is twofold, absolute or conditional. That there shall be by Divine Providence preserved in the world, to the world's end, such a company of Christians, who hold all things precisely and indispensably necessary to salvation, and nothing inevitably destructive of it; this, and no more, God hath promised absolutely. But a further assistance is conditionally promised, even such an assistance as shall lead us, if we be not wanting to it and ourselves, into all, not only necessary, but very profitable truth, and guard us from all, not only destructive, but also hurtful errors."

In 1863, the archbishops and bishops of the Church of England, in their protest to Bishop Colenso, affirmed: "All our hopes for eternity, the very foundation of our faith, our nearest and dearest consolations are taken from us, if one line of the Sacred Book be declared unfaithful or untrustworthy." And Colenso had merely called in question the Old Testament arithmetic!

From all this it appears that Protestantism was a system; not a movement, but a system, as fixed and determinate as that of Rome. It erected against unbelief what it considered to be impregnable barriers, and it guarded them with a mastiff's watchfulness. An inflexible creed could not be imposed, nor was it thought desirable, at least it was never entertained as feasible. There was little consistency of opinion among the reformers on speculative dogmas. They soon engaged in controversies, and fell asunder in divisions. The disputes about the sacraments were bitter,—about the fall of Adam, imputed sin and righteousness, predestination to bliss or bane. The confessions were at issue on cardinal points of doctrine. Some were compromised, others were dropped. In course of time great modifications were made in the body of the Protestant theology. Lutherans departed widely from Luther. The Lutheran Church in America deals gently with doctrinal differences; they drop the doctrine of the real presence, reject the authority of the Fathers, and insist only on the fundamentals, the necessity of personal union with Christ and faith in the sufficiency of the Scriptures. But they do insist on these. Calvinists modify materially, in some respects essentially, the beliefs held of prime moment by John Calvin, but belief in the necessity of regeneration through and by Christ, and in the sufficiency of the Scriptures, is never relaxed. The members of the Evangelical Alliance are very tolerant beyond certain limits; they talk as if they had caught the vision of the Free Religion men. But touch with your little finger the faith in the Savior, the necessity of a vital spiritual communion with him, the miraculous character and divine authority of the Word of God, and they are as sensitive as Luther was on the point of the sacrament, or the dogma of predestination. The Evangelical unions through the country seem to be very generous in surrendering unessential points; but the essential points are never qualified, or put, even by implication, in debate. A recent correspondent of the London Spectator, a Congregationalist, old and zealous, indignantly protests against the insinuation that there is any doctrinal despotism in the churches of his connection. But he does not deny that the discipleship in Christ, and the revelation in the Bible, are as cardinal now as ever. No man says such hard things of the Protestant theology as Henry W. Beecher. If we may credit the gossips, he serves Luther as Luther served the Pope, and deals out to Calvin the measure he dealt to Servetus, fastening up the fundamentals for derision, and scorching the articles with invective; but on the late occasion when he cut himself adrift from the churches, he avowed with whimsical solemnity his faith in the necessity of personal regeneration through Christ. As the tide flows in and out of a bay, people may drift into and out of his church, yet the church consists only of those who are made one with God in Christ!

A popular Congregational preacher bestows a generous ministry on the horse. Does he despair of the Gospel, or only of the man? As St. Paul turned from the unbelieving Jews to the Gentiles, does he turn from his church-members to the quadruped? The same apostle contrasts favorably the moral condition of Turk and Hindu with that of Christians. Does he think the Hindus and Turks need no regeneration, or only that the Christians need it more? Is he eulogizing the lost, or castigating the chosen? Mr. Alanson Pictou, in a note in his remarkable volume, The Mystery of Matter, says that in England many non-comformist places of worship contain the Westminster Confession on their title deeds. "But I know," he says, "by experience, that the assumption of office by the minister may be preceded, not by a signature of the creed, but by an express repudiation of it." He tells the story of a young student who was sent out from his college to preach at a village chapel. The man who met him at the railway-station was curious to know what precise attitude of doctrine the congregation might expect on Sunday. On his part the divinity student was curious to learn how the congregation stood in regard to doctrine. "Well, yo' seen, sir, some on 'em likes it high and some on 'em likes it low. I likes it middlin high myse'n." This indicates a vast change of mental attitude since the century came in; but it is a change in regard to matters which have always been subject to change, because always in debate. Protestants have fought hard for dogmatic uniformity; but Protestantism never pledged itself to such uniformity. Protestantism pledged itself to nothing but spiritual union with Christ through faith, and the divine sufficiency of the Word of God. This implied many things, the depravity of nature, the need of supernatural regeneration, the eternal distinction between the elect and the rejected. But on all these matters shades of difference were allowed that did not go the length of frittering the essential faith away.

You will ask why the essential faith should not be frittered away at last; why the process of disintegration should stop where it is; how anything can resist the course of demoralization that, setting in the moment of Protestantism's birth, has gone on with such prodigious force ever since, and has so completely pulverized every other ecclesiastical and speculative fragment of Christian institution? I answer, Nothing will arrest it. The decomposition will continue till the whole mass is decomposed. In fact, the end is already reached over large tracts of Christendom. What I contend for is, that, when it is reached, Protestantism will be dead. Instead of gaining its last victory as some imagine, it will suffer its final defeat, involving the final defeat of the "Christian" system. For Protestantism is spiritual, as distinguished from ecclesiastical Christianity. Its faith in Christianity was and is as absolute as that of Rome; its zeal for the Christ was and is more intense; its intellectual and moral grasp was and is more convulsively tenacious. It was an effort to come to close quarters with the Gospel, to penetrate the holy of holies, to meet the Redeemer face to face, to get within the direct pressure of his arm. If it has failed, the failure does not lie at its door. If it failed, it failed because it undertook the impossible. If it failed, the final effort to recover the religion which Rome was forced to let go,—which the sudden cry of a single monk precipated from its broad sides, as the avalanche slides from a mountain, and leaves it bare,—is exhausted, and the system of Luther shares the fate of the system of Hildebrand.

Four years ago, Rev. Ferdinand Ewer, of Christ Church, New York, delivered a series of six remarkable discourses on the "Failure of Protestantism." They were delivered in the interest of ecclesiastical Christianity, Dr. Ewer being an eloquent preacher of the "High Church" theory. His points were, and he put them with great force, that Protestantism had failed to get at the masses, and even to retain the masses it found prepared to receive it; that its logical issue is Rationalism, which is a repudiation of Christianity; that in its own provinces, where it has held exclusive sway for two and a half centuries, in Germany and Switzerland conspicuously, scepticism and disbelief, infidelity and atheism, are regularly sown and planted (he might have added by so-called Protestant preachers). The conclusion is that Protestantism must be abandoned—and the Church Catholic, of which the Roman Church is but a branch, must be restored to dignity and authority.

Dr. Ewer's description of the condition of Protestantism is not exaggerated in line or color. Had he written in the autumn of 1873, after the meetings of the Evangelical Alliance, he could have put in effects of light and shadow that would have made it more sombre still. The reports of the foreign delegates were cloudy with disappointment and misgiving. If their statements are credible (and certainly they would not have made such, had they been able to make others), Protestantism is rapidly declining in Germany; it makes no perceptible progress in France; in Spain and Italy it has no future. It achieves no fresh conquests, and at every point is giving way to the pressure of secular thought. The wail of Protestantism is as general as it is pathetic.

But Dr. Ewer is clearly wrong in ascribing all this ruin to Protestantism itself—to a fatal principle which it carried in its own bosom, to the inevitable logic of its own cardinal idea. He is wrong in holding Protestantism responsible for what Protestantism could not help. If Protestantism could not preserve Christianity, neither could Catholicism. If Protestantism cannot prevent infidelity, neither could Catholicism prevent Protestantism; and to charge Parker upon Luther is as unfair as it would be to charge Luther upon Leo. Back of them both was a power which was before them all, and which they were unable to resist; and that power was the HUMAN MIND, which is more than all churches and Bibles.

But has not all this ruin come about through the application of private judgment to religion? Most certainly. And is not the right of private judgment one of the cardinal principles, if not the cardinal principle, of Protestantism? No. Dr. Ewer assumes that it is, on the authority of tradition. This is one of the solemn commonplaces of Protestant talk and writing. Even so careful a thinker as John Stuart Mill speaks of the reformation as "the great and decisive contest against priestly tyranny for liberty of thought." A great, though hardly a decisive, contest against priestly tyranny it certainly was; but I do not find evidence that it was for liberty of thought. It was for a spiritual, as opposed to an ecclesiastical, faith.

But surely Luther translated the Bible into the popular German speech, in order that the humblest people might read it; he was glad to have it multiplied by the printing-press; in fact, the invention of the printing-press has been regarded as a providential aid to the Protestant religion, because it multiplied copies of the Bible. Protestantism is forever urging people to read the Bible for themselves, is thrusting it upon people, if they will not buy it, giving it to them, without note or comment, trusting it unreservedly to their private interpretation. What does this imply, if not the fullest confidence in the private judgment, the fullest acceptance of the principle of free thought? It implies the fullest confidence in the Bible.

Luther did translate the Bible; but with a firm belief in its inspired and inspiring virtue, with the devoutest of devout persuasion that it was more than able to protect itself against the assaults of unhallowed reason; that the glory which gilded the sacred page would communicate itself to all who read the book. Luther supposed that the Bible would fall into the hands of believers to whom an answering faith would explain it; of scientific unbelievers he had no thought. The same sublime confidence that animated Luther to translate the Bible animates his followers to disseminate it. They have no misgivings. Their faith that the book not merely contains the divine word, but imparts it,—that it has power to teach, convince, subdue,—that no honest seeker will miss the revelation,—that the immanent Christ will work wonders of conversion by means of the word,—that, being eternal, it cannot perish,—that, being the receptacle and organ of the Spirit, it will evidence and communicate the Spirit: this faith, as absolute as the Romanist's faith in his church, holds the eyes of Protestants so that they cannot see the dangers before them. They regard the prevalence of infidelity as an inscrutable dispensation, a strange phenomenon—intended perhaps as a trial of their faith; but it never occurs to them to doubt that their faith will be justified in the end. So far from connecting infidelity with the free reading of the Bible, they are convinced that the free reading of the Bible will check infidelity. To conceive any other result is to them impossible. They could as easily conceive of God as a liar.

Private judgment with Protestants is opposed to priestly judgment; it means that the sense of Scripture comes immediately to the individual, not mediately,—just as Christ himself does; that it is each believer's own concern. It does not mean liberty to read the Bible like any other book, to try it by literary laws, to judge its contents by rational standards; but merely liberty to find the oracles of God there,—not liberty to detect error, but liberty to be personally assured of the truth. This point cannot be made sharp enough. With Protestants, the liberty of private judgment excludes doubt, implies faith to start with. To start without faith is next door to sacrilege. Protestants are fond of quoting Pastor Robinson's farewell address to the pilgrims at Delft Haven:—

"Brethren, we are now quickly to part from one another, and whether I may ever live to see your faces on earth any more the God of heaven only knows; but whether the Lord has appointed that or no, I charge you before God and his blessed angels that you follow me no further than you have seen me follow the Lord Jesus Christ.

"If God reveal anything to you by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive any truth by my ministry; for I am verily persuaded the Lord has more truth yet to break forth out of His Holy Word. For my part, I cannot sufficiently bewail the condition of the reformed churches, who are come to a period in religion, and will go at present no further than the instruments of their reformation. The Lutherans cannot be drawn to go beyond what Luther said; whatever part of his will our God has revealed to Calvin, they will rather die than embrace it; and the Calvinists you see stick fast where they were left by that great man of God, who yet saw not all things.

"This is a misery much to be lamented. I beseech you, remember, it is an Article of your Church Covenant, 'That you shall be ready to receive whatever truth shall be made known to you from the written word of God.'"

Noble words, spoken in Protestantism's noblest spirit! But note the limitations. The truth must be "made known from the written word of God." The good man's vision of new truth as "breaking forth out of God's Holy Word" did not include any new truth which might break forth outside of it. He has no thought of any new WORD. Such thought would have been blasphemy. It was because the Bible was the divine word that more and more truth might be anticipated from its bottomless resources. The prophecy was inspired by his confidence in the Bible, not by his confidence in the human mind. Strauss says well: "The men of the Reformation conquered for us the right of free inquiry in Scripture; but modern science has conquered for itself the right of free inquiry about Scripture."

To identify Protestantism with liberty of thought is a mistake. It has opposed liberty of thought as vigorously as Romanism ever did, and in the same interest. Rome did not discourage liberty of thought, so long as it did not trespass on her ground. The moment free thought trespassed on her ground, Protestantism objected. In what directions has Protestantism encouraged liberty of thought? Not in the direction of Scripture interpretation. Small encouragement has she given to scholars like DeWette, Schenkel, Schwegler, Colenso. Not in the direction of theological speculation. How has she treated heresy? What was her attitude towards Dr. Channing and the Unitarians? How did she receive Theodore Parker? "Oh, Lord, if this man is a subject of grace, convert him and bring him into the kingdom of thy dear Son. But if he is beyond the reach of the saving influences of the Gospel, remove him out of the way, and let his influence die with him." What course does Protestantism pursue towards rationalists? Who fixed the stigma to the word "infidel"? Who gave to free thinking its bad name? In what tone do the organs of Protestantism speak of the liberal movement generally in religion? The comments of the entire Protestant press on the late Convention of the Free Religious Association sufficiently proves its hostility to thought, when it passes beyond its own border line. Does Protestantism encourage liberty of thought in the direction of positive knowledge of the material universe? Ask Tyndall; ask Huxley; ask Darwin; ask Herbert Spencer. The Young Men's Christian Association of New York refuse to admit to their reading room the Popular Science Monthly.

"But this is backsliding," you will say; "this is recreancy; this is infidelity to its first principle." Pardon me, no. It is fidelity to its first principle; it is steadfastness; it is conscientious loyalty to its traditions. It is not quite true to say, with Huet, that Protestantism was from the start inconsistent with itself; that, as a complex fact, it was struck with a radical contradiction. It would have been so had it appealed to reason and encouraged free investigation; for then it would have said almost in plain language, "Be free, and remain enslaved." The magic word "Liberty" which stirred the motions of nascent thought in the modern world, and at last shook the fabric of belief in pieces, was not spoken by Martin Luther. He admitted nothing contradictory or inconsistent.

Foolish persons, seeing Protestantism come in accompanied by literature, invention, discovery, the useful arts, civil liberty, popular movements of reform, the industrial advance of the common people, talk as if it called them all into being! You might as well say that the sail of a ship caused the wind, or that the mowing machine calls into existence the prairie, or that the telegraph wires cause electricity. After hearing the pastor of a Unitarian church ascribe the post-office to Christianity, nothing surprises me. That pious people should give Protestantism credit for the printing-press and the submarine cable seems rational. The same folk believe that Tenterden steeple was the cause of Goodwin Sands, and that thunder is the cause of lightning. Athanase Coquerel gives Protestantism credit for three things: 1. Spiritual liberty, including a full sense of private responsibility; 2. The family spirit, as opposed to the monkish; 3. The independence of the laity. But spiritual liberty, in our sense of the term, she never gave. The family spirit was native to the Germans, who first gave Protestantism a home. The independence of the laity became inevitable when the priesthood was abolished; but it was postponed and prevented and thwarted by the prophetic spirit, which stepped into its place and has not even yet resigned it. The secular elements of the world have not much to thank Protestantism for. We must rid ourselves, if possible, of delusions.

There is a superstition that Protestantism waked the human mind from a sleep of ages. Does the opening eyelid of the child cause the morning? Accepting the illusion, it is singular that Protestantism should so soon have discovered that it had roused the wrong passenger, and done its best to put him to sleep again, as the nurse tries to abolish the morning by another nap.

Protestantism was an indication that the human mind was beginning to stir; it was a convulsive twitching of the giant's eyelids. The huge creature had turned and stretched before. Arnold of Brescia, Giordano Bruno, Huss, Savonarola, Wyclyffe, were heavings of the monstrous frame. It was the human mind that shook Rome as Enceladus shook Etna. It burst out with a great cry in Martin Luther. It set Protestantism against itself; it fell upon the dogmas one by one and pulled them about till not one of them can be recognized in its tattered garb. It took the printed Bible, read it, studied it, sifted it, proved it uninspired, adopted it among the products of literature, and passed on to find other words of truth. It showed the eternal Christ to have been a man, the primeval Adam to have been a myth, the tempter to have been a teacher, and the fall to have been a rise. It dashed idol after idol, and at every stroke said, "Nehushtan," mere brass. It took personality from the Holy Ghost, reducing it to an influence. The stage properties of the drama of Redemption it remanded to the lumber room; and now it smiles when the mile stones it has passed boast of having impelled its progress along a road of their building.

Dr. Ewer calls Protestantism a pestilent heresy, and warns us to go back to the Church. But the Church could not hold the human mind three hundred years ago, when it was an infant as compared with its present growth. Protestantism proved that the hierarchy was a pestilent heresy. They are now both heresies to human thought, which throws them off as the serpent sheds his skin.

The word Protestantism will outlive the thing; the name always survives the faith. Already it is borne by many who have discarded the religion it stood for. Unitarians, Universalists, Transcendentalists, Rationalists, call themselves Protestants, even Protestants eminently and characteristically, Protestants of the Protestants; though they have no sympathy whatever with the Protestant idea. The Protestant camp swarms with these traitors disguised as friends. Men hate to drop respectable uniforms. The whole Protestant army will go over at last to the enemy, of course, without knowing it, simply because they wear the old badges and carry the old flag. Judge the power of Protestantism by the spread of its name; it looks immense. Judge of it by the vitality of its spirit, and it shrinks within a small compass. For its breath is well-nigh spent. Liberty of thought has proved too much for it. What seemed a terminus proves to be a way-station. The swift mind has struck another track, and presently not even the station-signal will be visible.

THE GUIDING STAR.

ABSTRACT OF A SERMON BY DR. BARTOL, JAN. 4, 1874.

"The star went before them." Before geographies were written, or charts or the use of charts discovered, sailors on the sea and processions on the land were guided by the stars. The stars were alike a protection and real help in progress. Hence arose the figure of the guiding star as applied to human life; the feeling of nearness to, and kinship with, the luminaries above. Indeed, this astrological interpretation, when divested of its mystic symbolism, was not altogether without significance. Napoleon believed in it,—that, when his star was in the ascendant, he was always successful. Once having decided upon certain plans of battle, one of his marshals remonstrated and endeavored to dissuade him from his purpose. "Do you see that star?" he asked of his hesitating subordinate. "No," was the reply. "But I do," was Napoleon's silencing rejoinder; and, following the impulse which it evoked, he went forward to victory. Like Napoleon each one had his star, his vocation, some peculiar work which he and he alone could do.

It was not to be supposed, the speaker said, that any orb left its proper place in the heavens and guided those wise men in their quest of the Savior. It did not move before them, nor was it, when they had reached their destination, hung high above the cradle of Jesus—a herald of his presence. Such a belief was the outgrowth of superstitious ignorance, untenable and illogical even in theory. It was an astronomical impossibility, crude in the idea and incapable of proof. The hope of the coming of a common Savior had taken possession of the minds of these men—had inspired them. It was a divine premonition leading and drawing them on, a something belonging to, and yet not of, themselves; and they were wise in that they yielded to it.

But the stars were only appearances; they signified what might be. Applying the symbolism to everyday life, our yearnings, our ideals were indications of what we might accomplish; but it was ours to make or mar, to realize or be disappointed. Truth and justice—these, the underlying and true bases of what we did accomplish—were the only realities.

Many mistook the office of the star. It was not so much to shine as to draw. One must "yoke his wagon to a star," and follow, an earnest faithful worker. He must work to some purpose. It was no barren emblem; the star was of vital importance.

"Thy mind was like a star and dwelt apart," wrote Wordsworth of Milton. So the ideal seemed apart and had perpetual power to draw. It was a propulsion and an attraction.

Man was great according to his might to love mankind. This point was overlooked in our culture. We put not loving, but knowing, first. Diligence, real merit, and vital enthusiasm, gave place to show. Ambition ruled the masses, and gain and intellectual supremacy were more sought after than distinction based upon worth and worthful endeavors. But character, not intellect, was true merit; faith, fidelity, and the knowledge that confidence could be reposed in one, were specially meritorious. Quality, not quantity, should be the object of attainment. Diplomas, certificates of rank, showy ceremonials and rhetorical laudations, did not in themselves promote excellent doing. True merit refused to be ticketed. Insignia, and decorations—all indications of rank—were the property of the soldier. They were a part of the grandeur, the emoluments of his service; but true culture and intrinsic worth could dispense with such empty honors.

Taking the great-minded Agassiz as an illustrious example of fidelity to one's high ideal, Dr. Bartol said: Love of knowledge and love of his kind dwelt in him without antagonism. His was a natural piety. His ardent enthusiasm was contagious to all who came within the range of his influence, and his unselfish devotion to his work was almost without parallel. If he had faults, they were forgotten; the soul of the man had such a glory in it that his example of resolute endeavor would never go out of fashion, or cease to be supreme. A single sentence would embalm his memory. "He loved much." It was his fittest characterization.

One's star—the vocation or work it symbolized—must be no proud and ostentatious thing. Love esteemed no office mean, no task degrading. Ambition was Napoleon's star; he mistook a meteor for a luminary, followed a will-o'-the-wisp, and found himself at last in darkness. The real star would consent to become a taper in your hand, and its flame was always steady and burned clearly. Well had the poet apostrophized the red planet, Mars, and prayed that he might emulate its calmness, and take his lesson from its constant, unvarying movement.

He, the speaker, had visited Miss Alcott during the past week, and to his mind the brilliant author was eclipsed by the woman in her tender ministrations in the sick chamber. Her star brightened in that act of tenderness and love, and her large heart proved her greater than her genius had. The act, when self was forgotten, was a consecration. Wherever duty ruled the mind and heart, there the star was. Not for intelligence alone, nor for conscience, nor for love did it stand, but for worship also. The soul of man missed its finest quality, if it did, not bend in prayer. In this the aroma of life consisted and was lost without the attitude of reverence.

Let each follow his star; not that of Jesus, but his own,—his conscience, his ideal of right and beauty and true goodness. God did not mean any man should be in doubt what to say or what to do. When the sky was clear, the sailor took his observations of the sun, and obtained his true reckoning; so man in his lucid intervals should find his true position and fix his direction. Some said it was dangerous to make the inward guiding instinct the rule of life, when the written word supplied all requisite directions; but it was not so. This was needed out of the many rules to discern and apply the one appropriate to each individual case. All had this interior guide, and the responsibility of their acts rested with them. Duty was the shining star, and it alone could save. It could easily be discerned who follow their star; it was an "open secret," known to all. Everything betrayed obedience to the highest. He who was faithful to the guiding impulse was surrounded by an atmosphere through which impurity or harm could not come. It was an aspiration, a help, and a protection.

A PLEA FOR FAITH AS THE FOUNDATION OF THEISM.

BY S. P. PUTNAM.

Though I agree with almost everything that Mr. Abbot says, yet his essay, "The God of Science," does not satisfy me. The main point is not met, namely, Has the pure intellect cognition of the Infinite? We cannot think the Infinite, and therefore it seems to me that, as far as the understanding is concerned, we cannot prove that it is. If we believe in God as infinite and absolute, we must do so by faith, that is, by a concurrent act of feeling and will without the evidence of reason to base it upon.

Most cordially do I assent to Mr. Abbot's proposition that—"One Force rules throughout space; one Law rules throughout time; and the Force and the Law are themselves explicable as one only as Mind." But the question that troubles me is: Can science prove that Force, that Law, that Mind, to be infinite and eternal? I claim that it cannot. It can only show that they exist in finite relations. Call Nature a "living whole," the all in all; is it, according to science, infinite and absolute? I care not for the name,—God, Nature, Law, Force, Mind; what I want is infinitude, and science cannot furnish that. It can prove the unity of all things, but not their infinity. It can take cognizance of phenomena, and assume a certain amount of being to account for phenomena; but it cannot go one step beyond. No array of phenomena, from flower to farthest star, demands Infinite Being for its cause. Science can assume being enough to produce the phenomena, but not one bit more. The question is this: Can the finite prove the Infinite? I say, no. Whatever vast discoveries science may make in regard to the former, it can never reach the latter. It is forever confined to the limited, the relative. I do not see any way out of these into the Infinite except by Faith.

Does Mr. Abbot assume that Nature is infinite and eternal? By what authority does he do it? He assumes the very thing for which I demand proof.

I am as much opposed to intuition as Mr. Abbot. I do not think there is any faculty outside of the pure intellect by which we see God and know that he is, without proof. If such a faculty did exist, why such a desperate effort to demonstrate God's existence? We might as well endeavor to prove that the sun shines. The fact that so many efforts have been made to prove that God is shows that there is no intuitional faculty to see him by. If there were, no one would ever think of asking for proof. Intuition is only a swift, and perhaps unconscious, activity of the intellect, and, like that, is confined to the limited and relative.

I do not like Kant's theory, which makes the reason and understanding two separate faculties. The word "reason" may mean more than the word "understanding;" but they are both confined to the operations of the intellect, and therefore to the limited and relative. There can be no "outward revelation" from God, until we first prove that he is. Revelation cannot prove God to be; it is God's existence that must prove the revelation to be.

Neither science, intuition, reason, nor revelation, can lead to the Infinite and Eternal. What does? FAITH,—that is, an act of will dictated by feeling. The will is the soul's regnant faculty. It has a sort of creative power,—the only power by which we can pass from the finite to the Infinite, from the relative to the absolute.

Hamilton says that the Infinite is simply negation. Spencer, with profounder perception, says that it is positive not to thought, but to feeling. Byron sings of the "feeling infinite." This feeling appeals to the intellect, but in vain. The intellect, through science, can show a vast amount of being, glorious in its operation, magnificent in its phenomena, but, with all its plenitude of operation and phenomena, confined to the finite. It does not reach the Infinite. The awful chasm from the finite to that is leaped only by a sheer act of will. We want to believe in God, and therefore we do. I can give no other reason for my belief; I simply will it. My will makes God more certain to me than science, intuition, or revelation.

Is this a legitimate act? Science must decide. But are we not sometimes thrown back upon the will in questions of practical importance? When Othello, tossed with tormenting doubts, sees Desdemona and says, "I'll not believe it!" was there anything wrong in that act of mere will, dictated by overpowering feeling without any evidence to the understanding? Are we not sometimes forced in our various experiences to do the same thing, to crush doubt by a sheer act of will, and make what we want true to be true as far as we are concerned, by choosing to believe when it is impossible to determine truth by evidence? So when we cannot by science show that God is, have we not a right in our deep need and yearning to appeal to the soul's supreme faculty and will a belief? Our affections must "run to waste, or water but the desert," if by such an act we cannot force our way into the infinitudes of God.

It seems to me that this is the explanation of Mr. Abbot's own belief. He confesses that science does not as yet prove the existence of God. He rejects intuition and revelation. But he believes in God. Does he not will that belief? He wants to believe in God, and therefore does. Is not faith, then,—that is, an act of will induced by feeling,—the foundation of his theism?

I do not see that science conflicts with such an act of will. Its relations to it are harmonious.

In the first place science is to show that such an act cannot be imperative. Science itself is imperative. What she finally declares must be believed. Really I do not want God's existence proved. I desire to exercise my free will in the matter, to be able to say yes or no. I do not wish theism to become a creed, but to remain a choice,—a choice which no man is compelled to make, except so far as dictated by his individual feeling.

Again, it is science that enables us to make this choice. Savage and ignorant men cannot do it. It is the vast results of science that unfold the "feeling infinite,"—that give us intelligence and character enough to make the choice.

Again, when by an act of will we have assumed that God is, then science shows the quality of his being in its finite manifestations. Science cannot prove that God is, but it can prove that certain qualities exist in him.

I think, then, that we must resort to faith for our belief in God,—to what Mr. Abbot calls "secular faith." Ecclesiastical faith must be put aside. To believe in God simply because the Church or custom or respectability tells us to is wrong. But to believe in God because we want to, by an act of will, recognizing it as such, and therefore not imperative on others, is, I think, right. I do not see any other way by which to believe in God. I cannot accept the "God of Science." It is finite, something that is in conditions and limits. With the pure intellect I cannot go beyond these. Only by an act of will can I sweep out into the infinitudes of God. My will shall not be the slave of science; but science shall be the servant of my will to make it more wise, more strong, and more daring—not to check it, when it would leap from all phenomena into the splendor of the Infinite. Let science say: "I linger on the shores of the finite; here is my work. It is thine to will to go beyond. But remember, in thy far flight, that without my teaching and impulse thou wouldst never have been capable of this transcendent act. It is I that kindled the immeasurable desire, and gave thee the motive power to make this, thy supreme volition."

"THE KINGDOM COMES."

BY MRS. SARAH BRIDGES HYNES.

Hark! in the desert sounds a prophet's voice:
"God's blessed kingdom comes!
No need to bow before the temple's vail,
The Ark and Holy Place
Are in men's hearts and homes!

"The deaf do hear, the blind are made to see,
The dead in soul are raised;
The living God, the very life of life,
The Word that is I AM,
By wakening man is praised!

"The creeds of churches and the shams of faith
Shake like the withering leaves;
But the great root in deep foundation sunk,
Whence truth eternal springs,
Undying strength receives!

"And growth is upward through the earthly air
Towards the cloudless heaven,
And by the fruits that ripen in the sun
Humanity shall know
God's incarnation given!

"And Immortality is this To-day,
The everlasting Now,
And every spirit its own saving Christ,
That ne'er 'Tis finished!' cries,
Or murmurs at the how!

"Slowly there dawns, through superstition's night,
Religion's spreading ray;
And lo, the worn-out sacraments and signs
Melt in the glowing grace
Of coming perfect day!"

Strong is the Voice, on God's wild honey fed;
And with his fan in hand
The prophet with the wind of thought will purge
The precious wheat from chaff,
And hail the Promised Land!

And if ye ask: "In wilderness of doubt
Where is this prophet found?"
Lo, in the hopes of your own secret soul,
The Kingdom draweth nigh,
The prophet's accents sound!

Dunlop, $4.50; Huldah Robinson, $2.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or single numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

SUNDAY LECTURES.—The Editors of The Index will lecture occasionally on Sundays, if desired, within a convenient distance of Boston.

CASH PREMIUMS FOR 1874.

In order to increase the circulation of The Index, and thereby make it a more powerful instrumentality in the reform to which it is devoted, the following Cash Premiums are now offered:—

1. The Index will pay to any one of its old subscribers $1.00 for every new subscription of $3.00 obtained by his or her means and forwarded to this office. If preferred, the $1.00 may be deducted before remitting. This offer holds good for new subscriptions alone, and not for renewals.

2. In addition to this, it offers One Hundred Dollars to the person who shall send the largest list of new subscribers, with the money, before the first day of February, 1874, and Fifty Dollars to the person sending the next largest list during the same time.

There are many warm friends of The Index throughout the country who would be glad to help increase its circulation, if they could only afford to give their time to the work. The above offers will enable them to do so. Supposing that the largest list sent contains one hundred new names, the sender will be entitled to $100.00 as commission and another $100.00 as premium. Will not many of our lady subscribers, who are the most efficient of all canvassers, seize this opportunity to help The Index without too great a sacrifice on their own part?

GLIMPSES.

The "Congressional Petition" against church-exemption foots up 779 signatures thus far; the "Massachusetts Petition" foots up 803.

We have recently, by a stretch of indulgence, published two very good communications, apparently from the same party, which were sent anonymously. A third has just been received, sent in the same manner. It is necessary to remind anonymous correspondents that they violate the well-known rules of all respectable journals. The names of contributors will be withheld, if desired; but the present article will be reserved until the writer sends his address to this office.

The Christian Statesman announces that petitions for the Christian Amendment are now receiving numerous signatures, and reports one from Vermont with two hundred and sixty-one names, including M. H. Buckham, President of the University of Vermont. It is indefatigable in the cause it serves with equal ability and sincerity. If our readers habitually read it, few of them would despise a movement of which very few appreciate the earnestness and strong convictions. No blunder is so fatal as that of despising one's antagonists.

If the readers of The Index find a double-dose of "Glimpses" a poor substitute for the "Notes and Comments" with which Mr. Stevens usually graces the first page of this paper, they will generously forgive the make-shift, when they learn that a severe cold which obstinately settled on his lungs made us urge upon him a temporary change of climate, and that in consequence he accepted an invitation to occupy for a few weeks Mr. Vickers' pulpit in Cincinnati. No one can regret his absence more keenly than we do; and he will find both from his public and private friends an equally warm welcome on his return.

Signatures to the two petitions for the abolition of church exemption are now multiplying rapidly. For the "Congressional Petition," Mr. Joseph Sedgebeer, of Painesville, Ohio, sends us three hundred and nineteen names; Mr. George H. Foster, of Boston, adds eighteen more to the long list reported by him a fortnight ago; Mr. John Galvin, of South Boston, sends us sixty-two; and Mr. M. V. Lenz, of Trent, Michigan, sends us seventy-two. For the "Massachusetts Petition," Mr. M. T. Dole, of Boston, and the Banner of Light, send us a fine list of four hundred and two names; Mr. Isaiah C. Sears, Jr., of East Dennis, sends sixty-one; Mr. E. Myrick, of Harvard, sends thirty-three; Mr. John Galvin, of South Boston, sends sixty-two; Mr. James Crosier, of Amherst, sends ninety-four; Mr. Anson Wyman, of Boston, sends twenty-one; Dr. H. B. Storer, of Boston, sends forty-four; and Mr. Francis Jackson, of Lanesville, sends forty-six. Keep the ball rolling!

In our article of last week on "The Unitarian Crisis," we failed to state with sufficient exactitude Mr. Potter's reason for not feeling called upon to withdraw his name from a list of "Unitarian" ministers. His reason was not so much that he was a Unitarian with reference to the doctrine of the Trinity, as it was that, in his opinion, "Unitarianism might be interpreted as certain religious tendencies, of which historically free inquiry and character before creed had been emphasized as fundamental principles." We make this correction wholly on our own motion, not by request, in order to give our readers as truthful a representation as possible of what we consider to be a transaction destined in the future to exercise a marked influence on the development of religious thought in this country. When the most liberal of all Christian sects finds it necessary, in order to save its own Christian character and reputation, to expel from its communion such a man as Mr. Potter, the outside world will see in this necessity an unanswerable proof of the impossibility of reconciling Christianity with spiritual freedom. The act in itself is trivial; but millions of people can understand a trifle better than a principle. It is a pithy sermon on The Index text that Christianity and Freedom are oil and water to each other.

In an article of nearly three columns, entitled "A Retractation," and addressed to "the editor of The Index," which we find in the Christian Union of January 7, Rev. Edward C. Towne publicly expresses his contrition for having used the "method of antagonism" and for having been guilty of the various "sins of criticism, controversy, and personality into which it has betrayed" him. As a personal confession, we have nothing to do with it. But so far as it implies that we have been his companion in such "sins," we respectfully decline to join him in making this confession; we have never antagonized individuals, or used the personalities which he (with unnecessary ostentation, we think) now apologizes for. But antagonism to ecclesiastical usurpations and organized tyrannies of superstition we believe in to-day more than ever. Simple error of opinion should be met with intellectual weapons alone; but overt or covert attempts to establish, to perpetuate, or to strengthen political power in the hands of the Church calls self-evidently for political opposition. "With malice towards none, but with charity for all," we would nevertheless refuse to be recreant to the patriot's duty of defending religious liberty at the ballot-box. We have no confession to make, no apology to offer, no retreat to begin; The Index has nailed its flag to the mast, and will either sail on to victory, or sink to the bottom, like the "Cumberland," with its colors unstruck.

Have the Baptist associations which professed to be in favor of taxing church property become scared at the prospect of the speedy success of this measure, or have they pretended to favor it insincerely? One of their own most respectable journals, the Examiner and Chronicle, drops hints which pointedly suggest one of these unwelcome conclusions. It says: "The question of taxing church property is now so fully before the people of New Jersey that our own brethren are putting their heads together to defeat the new constitutional provision. We hope this movement against the proposed provision will be successful. A State can as well afford to relieve church property from taxation as to make schools a tax upon its income. Virtue is certainly no less important to the welfare of a State than is intelligence; and no teachers of the highest forms of virtue can be compared with churches, combining the pulpit, the Sunday-school, and personal visitations. Why then should so great an innovation be now made, as to impose unwonted burdens on the supporters of churches existing for the public good, and sustained by the voluntary contributions of their friends?" It appears that opposition to this most righteous demand is beginning to manifest itself on the part of the churches. To surrender the profitable privilege of tax-exemption without a fight for it would be contrary to ecclesiastical human nature; nevertheless, the reform must go on. Let its friends redouble their activity in getting signatures to the "Petitions."

THE GREAT "INDEX" PETITION PRESENTED IN CONGRESS.

The telegraphic dispatches from Washington to the Associated Press, under date of January 7, announced that the Hon. Charles Sumner had presented to the United States Senate "a petition of 35,000 persons of Ohio against the proposed theological amendment to the Constitution. He said the length of the petition was 953 feet. Referred to the Committee on Judiciary." Mr. Sumner undoubtedly stated the facts correctly at the time. This was the monster petition which was sent nearly a year ago by The Index (then of Toledo, Ohio), and which, on account of the near approach of the close of the session, Mr. Sumner then informed us he would present at this session. We regret that the mistake was committed, by the telegraphic dispatch, of crediting the signatures to Ohio alone, when they had been sent, as duly reported in The Index during the year 1872, from all parts of the country from Maine to California. The utility of collecting such a great number of names in protest against the Christian Amendment movement can be seen in the impression produced by it on the public press, as illustrated in the following editorial paragraph from the Boston Daily Globe of January 8:—

"Ohio would seem to be sound on the Constitution, to judge from the very lengthy petition which Mr. Sumner presented in the National Senate, yesterday, from that State, against the proposed theological amendment. It is seldom that 35,000 people can be found to sign an appeal against a wise measure, and the 953 feet of the petition certainly go a great way in demonstrating the absurdity of the proposed constitutional plan of salvation. As the most truly religious men in the country are opposed to the amendment, there does not seem much chance for its passage. Indeed, we can only imagine it being engineered through as a rider for some scheme of back pay that needed a strong theological backing."

Yet, on the very same day on which this huge remonstrance was presented to Congress, the Governor of Massachusetts, accompanied by his staff, the Adjutant-General, the Executive Council, and the Senate and House of Representatives, marched in procession to Hollis Street Church, Boston, to listen to an Annual Election Sermon by Rev. Richard G. Greene, of Springfield, which was a most striking comment on the necessity of influencing public opinion by such means as the press, the platform, the Liberal League, the circulation of petitions, and so forth. The custom of convening the State government annually to listen to a sermon by a Christian minister, officially appointed for the purpose, is a relic of the old union of Church and State which once obtained in Massachusetts; and it is a very significant sign of the times that this custom, which had fallen into desuetude for several years, is this year revived once more. It shows the growing power of reactionary sentiment on this subject, and should give a greatly needed warning to the radicals that they have a very important public duty to discharge. The drift of Mr. Greene's sermon is sufficiently expressed in its title, "Christianity a National Law." The preacher insisted that Christianity should have a "recognized administration in civil government;" he dwelt on the various ways in which this legal administration of the Christian religion is now secured, and defended the practices against which the "Demands of Liberalism" are directed; and, although he saw no advantage in insisting on the Christian Amendment at present, he admitted the possible propriety of adopting it by-and-by. "It may as well be understood now and for all the future," he said, "that to the enthroning of Godlessness in law Christianity can never consent. And it may even be that, if the attempt in this direction should gain much force, the emergency might arise when things trivial before would take on new weight, and when that formal recognition of God and Christ which is not now at all demanded by the great mass of Christian people should grow to be indispensable for the replacing of the ancient national foundations, endangered by the attacks of ungodly fury, the underminings of an insidious unbelief, and that feeble magnanimity to opposers which is already visible in some sections of the Christian army."

The liberals of America must be wise in season, or prepare themselves for submission to renewed aggressions and oppressions from which they now fancy themselves secure. The only way to guard effectively against the revival of ancient bigotry and tyranny is to perfect the guarantees of religious liberty in our organic law. Let them not be contented with simply protesting against the proposed Christian Amendment, but rather press with vigor the "Demands of Liberalism" for a Republic untrammelled by the Church, and above all for the passage of a Religious Freedom Amendment to the United States Constitution which shall make liberty the law of the whole country, all the inconsistencies of the separate States to the contrary notwithstanding. Sleepers, awake! Freedom cries to you for protection!

THE GROUND OF THEISM:

A DIALOGUE.

"If she be false, O then heaven mocks itself!
I'll not believe it!"—OTHELLO.

ARTHUR.—The wind is dreary enough out of doors to-night, and the bright blaze of your fire tempts me to stay here with you rather than go to my chamber to read. Besides, I want to talk with you. Will you grant me the favor of an hour or two?

ERNEST.—Most gladly. I am tired of work, and the favor will be on your side, not mine.

ARTHUR.—Since our conversation of yesterday, I have been thinking much of what you said. I am convinced that, for all men who enter in any degree into the spirit of the age, revelation will no longer serve as a basis for the belief in God. I am also convinced that intuition, as a special faculty of spiritual vision distinct from the understanding, is equally incapable of serving as such a basis. Shall I say that science, the foundation on which you rely, seems to me just as weak a basis as the other two? Yet, with this deep hunger in my heart that nothing else can satisfy, I must and do believe in God. There is, there must be, some more solid ground for my belief than either of the three.

ERNEST.—I listen to you with the deepest and truest sympathy; for I confess, dear friend, that the hunger in your heart cannot be greater than in mine. Have you found this more solid ground?

ARTHUR.—Yes, I think I have; and I wanted to tell you my thought, being sure of your sympathy beforehand. The only ground of theism that appears to me really tenable is faith.

ERNEST.—The word has so many meanings that I should like to know exactly what sense you would give to it.

ARTHUR.—I mean by faith an act of will dictated by feeling. Spencer and Byron—philosopher and poet alike—recognize the "feeling infinite" which haunts us all. It is nothing to the intellect, but it moves the will with mighty power. In a word, we want to believe in God, and therefore we do. I can give no other reason for my belief: I simply will it. My will makes God more certain to me than revelation, intuition, or science.

ERNEST.—I am anxious to comprehend you fully; can you illustrate this act of faith?

ARTHUR.—When Othello, tormented by suspicions of Desdemona's infidelity, saw her, and exclaimed, "I'll not believe it!" there was no evidence whatever to his understanding; but overpowering feeling prompted an act of will which crushed his doubt, and made what he wanted true to be true to him. That is what I mean by faith. Our own deep yearning to believe is a just ground of belief, or else our noblest and grandest affection, the love of God, is as water poured into the sand. Whatever is false, that love is the truest thing in man; yet it too is false, if God be not.

ERNEST.—I think I understand you now; but I hesitate to reply. So utterly do I reverence the feeling of which you speak, that I cannot bear to criticise the faith which is to you, evidently, the chief support and stay of your soul. Let the subject drop; we have talked enough. Yet in simple honesty I must tell you, before we finally dismiss it, that your thought is not mine,—wholly, at least. Let us talk of something else.

ARTHUR.—No, I want to talk of this subject above all others.

ERNEST.—Arthur, do you love the truth?

ARTHUR.—Indeed I believe I do.

ERNEST.—Are you sure of it? If atheism were the truth, would you look it steadily in the face, and deliberately choose it rather than the beautiful delusion le theism? Can you rise so high above the moral giv of common men that, rather than believe a joy- pref lie or cherish a lovely superstition, you would (what pluck your heart out of your breast, or unison w be so much harder) school it to beat in who have thought my must; what hope for me, ness of Christian Or out of the Egyptian dark- to stop thinking now?

ERNEST.—Then drink deep draughts of the thinker's wine, courage and steadfastness to face all the possibilities of thought! The clodhopper makes a nobler journey who trudges to market afoot to sell his carrots, than the aëronaut who starts for the stars, but dares not cut the rope that binds his balloon to the stake.

ARTHUR.—Enough! Give me now your frankest criticism of the ground of my belief in God.

ERNEST.—I will do it, but not as a critic,—rather as one who, like yourself, loves truth better than victory, and would make all thought a stepping-stone to thought still truer. You quote, then, Othello's impassioned "I'll not believe it!" But he straightway went and believed it! Just as surely, in this age of the world, will all belief in God that rests on will alone, and yet dares to think, end in disbelief. Whoever cries in desperation, "I will believe!" shows that belief is gone: it is the cry of scepticism horror-struck at its own reflection in the mirror of consciousness. No will is sustained or strong enough, by sheer force of its own tension, to exclude the influence of thought, which, like the ether, permeates and penetrates the barriers of all our crass volitions. What is it that has crumbled the old faith, and is crumbling it still? Thought! And it will crumble every faith that can be built—except the faith that it builds itself. He who rests belief on feeling, or will, or both combined, must beware of thought, the universal disintegrant of all such beliefs.

ARTHUR.—But there are beliefs that thought cannot build. Othello's faith in Desdemona, the sheer refusal of his will to credit the insinuations of Iago, was truer than his thought. It was the outburst of his better nature, the indignant protest of his soul against a falsehood he could not demonstrate. If he had only adhered to this supreme volition, he would not have been torn from the last anchorage of his love by his own accursed suspicions. He should not only have crushed doubt by his will, but also have kept it crushed. So it is with the horrible suspicions of atheism, doubting the purity of this divine universe. Thought cannot quell them. Feeling, will, can alone do that.

ERNEST.—Study Othello's case more deeply. Iago had no hold upon the generous nature of his victim but by the thoughts he suggested. It was thought that compelled Othello to cry out in agony,

"Make me to see it, or, at the least, so prove it
That the probation bear no hinge, nor loop,
To hang a doubt on: or, woe upon thy life!"

It was thought which, working upon the cunning evidences of Iago—the alleged talking of Cassio in his sleep, the seeming loss of the handkerchief so artfully stolen by Iago himself,—at last overwhelmed the distracted Moor with the weight of apparent demonstration, and wrung from him the wail of dying faith,

"Now do I see 'tis true. Look here, Iago,
All my fond love thus do I blow to heaven:
'Tis gone!"

Thought was too mighty for his love and his will. All the volitions in the universe are powerless against a perception. What poor Othello needed was, not a stronger volition to believe in his wife's purity, but greater penetration to pierce through the damnable plot against her. In a word, it was thought that stabbed his faith; and it was thought alone that could have healed the hurt. Is my moral plain?

ARTHUR.—Not exactly.

ERNEST.—I mean that the doubts of theism forced on so many minds in this age are all born of thought, of reflection, of reasoning; and that there is no possible way of allaying them but by more thought, more reflection, more reasoning. If these avail not, nothing will avail. If theism is defeated on the ground of thought and reason, atheism will triumph because it is true.

ARTHUR.—Yet, when we cannot by thought (or science) show that God is, have we not a right, in our deep need and yearning, to appeal to the soul's supreme faculty, and will a belief? This is really the basis and authentication of your own belief; for you too believe in God, if I truly understand you. You confess that science does not yet prove his being; yet you believe. Do you not will that belief? You want to believe, and therefore do believe. Is not faith, that is, an act of will induced by feeling, the foundation of your own belief as well as of mine?

ERNEST.—No! You have profoundly misunderstood me. All the faith in God I once had that rested ultimately on revelation, on tradition, on education, on intuition, on feeling, on will, is absolutely and forever gone. The faith I have in him rests exclusively on thought. I came years ago to the conviction that reason or intellect is the only enduring basis for any belief that can be put into words. When you say, "God exists," you utter an intellectual proposition with subject and predicate; and intellect alone, by which every predication is made, can justify it to the thinker. I believe in God because my intellect is satisfied of his existence,—because science (which is simply the application of intellect to Nature) has built up, at least in my own mind, a new faith which follows thought, and does not go before it. I believe in God because I am willing to disbelieve in him, if the truth of atheism can be shown. I believe in God because, as the thinker must, I swept my mind clear of every preconception, and bent every energy of my intellectual nature on the task of discovering afresh, for myself, simply what is true. When I say that science has not yet proved God, I mean that I am not conceited enough to set up my own conclusions as those of universal science; that every other mind is as free to come to a different conclusion as mine has been to come to this; and that science cannot be said in general to have established God's existence, until the fact of his existence has taken its place with the other unquestioned results of scientific inquiry. Whoever can overthrow my present intellectual conviction, on purely intellectual grounds, by showing that the great ideas of modern science—unity of force, unity of law, unity of end or tendency—disprove God, and do not prove him, as they seem to me to do, will also overthrow my faith built upon that conviction. But I look about me in vain to discover one who seems even to understand this intellectual conviction to which I refer. The time will certainly come when men will grapple with it, and put it to the severe test of universal criticism; but it has not come yet. Meanwhile I see the world stumbling blindly in dense fogs, distrusting the old and not daring to trust the new; and I wait patiently till the growing confidence in science shall bring at last the willingness to abide, in every question of pure truth, by her method alone. Whether my anticipation of her results will then stand her tests, I do not presume to predict; this only I say, that, as for me, science has already proved the reality of God. I have no other basis for my theism; if this is ever destroyed, from that day am I an atheist.

ARTHUR.—And can you thus resolutely crush out of sight and consciousness the blessed and tender affections of the religious life, the inextinguishable yearnings after God's love and felt presence in your soul, the mighty stirrings of reverence and awe and worship in your own heart? You make me shudder, as if you were an intellectual Frankenstein, a dehumanized monster, a mere logic-machine into which nothing but intellect had been infused. Surely, it is not a belief in God conditioned on the result of a logical process for which the sorrowing, suffering, toiling, and weary world hungers to-day.

ERNEST.—O my friend, you would do me most grievous wrong, if you thought my heart empty of those feelings which make man the standing miracle of Nature. If your child fell into the river, would you stop to tell or think how you loved it, how dear and winsome and precious it was to you, how blank your home and bruised your heart would be without it? Or would you plunge into the stream in utter recklessness of your life, bear it swiftly out of the devouring flood, and then in silence strain the rescued little one to your bosom? Characters differ. It is mine to act, as well as to feel. What, do you imagine, prompts a thinker to give his days and nights to the rescue of man's faith in God, his heart-trust and moral inspiration and spiritual joy, when all these are put in jeopardy by the increase of a knowledge that is but half comprehended, even by those who in their own special lines are nobly increasing it? What lies back of the intense activity of his brain, as he toils over problems that wring the beads from his brow, gives up to the lonely pursuit of truth the hours that might be fertile of the prizes clutched after by the crowd, and turns his back on prizes that even he holds dear? What but a mighty hunger for God can explain this weary, unending search for him? What else can explain the unthanked effort to make plain a path to him that no man wants to travel? All free thinkers see that the old faith, claiming to be itself foundation and substratum, is decaying daily. Some of them see that a higher faith, just as precious, and all the more enduring because built upon the foundation of knowledge universally and permanently secured, must still be possible. If, then, I seek knowledge, with avowed resolve to take no substitute for it, but to shape my whole life as best I may in accordance with it,—if I face the possibility of all conclusions as the sole condition of attaining any conclusion that shall be stable and true,—it is not because I despise faith that is rational, but because I feel the value of it so profoundly that the greatest glory of science seems to me to be her power to carry up all thought, all feeling, all will, to their natural unity in God. She must be the world's guide out of the faith that is lost to a faith better than that which is lost; and before the rear of the great army has left the old, the van has already entered into the new. It is because I have such absolute trust in the truth, born of thought and experience, that the coming supremacy of science promises to my imagination only the riper, richer, and more splendid development of humanity, with all its glorious affections.

ARTHUR.—But, granting that science shall create a new faith of some sort, it cannot be the faith we crave, for two reasons: first, the only God that can be proved by science must remain a problematical or probable one, subject to the ghastly if of doubt; and, secondly, the God of science cannot be infinite, eternal, and absolute, since the intellect can never transcend the finite, the temporary, the relative.

ERNEST.—Let me ask if you believe that your own "faith," the "act of will dictated by feeling," proves God to demonstration?

ARTHUR.—No, nor do I want God's existence proved. I desire to exercise my free will in the matter,—to be able to say yes or no. I do not wish him to become a creed, imposed imperatively by science upon the minds of all, but a choice to which no man is compelled, except so far as it is dictated by his individual feeling.

ERNEST.—Then your God, also, is merely a problematical or probable one, whose objective existence is uncertain, and whose subjective existence in your own mind depends solely on your own volition. So far, however, as God is proved by science at all, he is proved to exist objectively. I admit that the strength of our faith in him must depend on the strength of the proof given by science. But if my faith in God is as strong as my faith in the law of gravitation, it will be strong enough to satisfy every demand of my own head and heart. This result I anticipate for the whole world, when science, now a mere infant, shall have grown mature. With reference to your second reason, let me ask whether you believe space to be infinite or finite?

ARTHUR.—I believe it to be infinite.

ERNEST.—Why? By faith—an act of will dictated by feeling? Or by intellectual proof?

ARTHUR.—To be consistent, I suppose I must say, by faith; otherwise I should have to admit that the intellect can prove the infinite.

ERNEST.—Exactly so. But the infinity of space is as certainly to be demonstrated by the pure intellect as any theorem in Euclid. For instance, if space is limited, it must be limited by something, by some actual boundary. But every boundary presupposes space on both sides of itself; and therefore no boundary can limit space. The illimitability or infinity of space is thus demonstrated by what is known as the reductio ad absurdum; which every geometer knows to be an irrefutable proof. Hence it is a mistake to hold that the pure intellect cannot attain the infinite. Imagination, it is true, cannot picture it; but the intellect needs no pictures. Reason comprehends the idea of infinity as easily and completely as the idea of the finite; one is the negation, the other the affirmation, of a limit. If either is intelligible, so is the other.

ARTHUR.—I do not see how to deny this. But what has it to do with God?

ERNEST.—This, that the intellect is competent to reach the infinite metaphysically; and, when science has demonstrated the unity of all forces (which at present is rather a highly probable fact than an absolutely demonstrated truth), the intellect will be competent to reach the infinite dynamically. Thus: if force is limited, it must be by opposing force. But the limiting or opposing force must be other than itself. If, consequently, all forces are demonstrated to be one, there can be no limiting force; and the illimitability or infinity of force is demonstrated. The power in Nature will thus be proved to be one and illimitable—an infinite unit like space or time; and this infinite Power, operating throughout infinite space and infinite time, and manifesting itself by invariable law tending to one intelligible end (evolution), is the God of Science, of whom all Nature (including man) is the constant manifestation comprehensible more or less by all intelligent beings.

ARTHUR.—I will think of all this further.

ERNEST.—Before we separate, let me say that I see no hope of vindicating theism against atheism on the ground of revelation or of intuition, in the usually accepted meanings of those words,—still less on the ground of an act of faith which is a mere subjective "will to believe" on the part of individuals. The only basis of theism that can withstand the dissolving action of modern thought is the basis of science; and the only faith that can survive it is the faith that grows out of thought itself. This is, at least, my own profound conviction, which is the product of my intellect alone, yet results from long, close, tireless thought for which I can account only by my own "thirst for the living God." To you the faith I cherish, conditioned as it is avowedly on the validity of my intellectual processes, may seem unattractive, cold, or perilously weak; yet in sincerity and humbleness must I declare its absolute sufficiency for my own moral and spiritual needs. By it I live, and by it must I die. But when it shows me the beauty, sanctity, and unspeakable glory hidden in the human soul, connecting this with the One Power that fills and governs all as its highest manifestation, indeed I do not feel myself to be "without God in the world."

RECORDS OF A QUIET LIFE. By Augustus J. C. Hare. Revised for American Readers by Wm. L. Gage. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1873.

This work is an abridgment of Memorials of a Quiet Life, edited by A. J. C. Hare, and published in London in 1872. The men whom it chiefly concerns are Augustus and Julius Hare, the authors of Guesses at Truth. These brothers were educated under the direction of their aunt, "Lady Jones," widow of Sir Wm. Jones. Both took orders in the English Church, Augustus accepting the living of Alton-Barnes, and Julius that of Hurstmonceaux. The chief interest of the book, however, centres upon Mrs. Maria Hare, the wife of Augustus. After four or five years of most happy married life, during which she and her husband were assiduously devoted to the promotion of both the temporal and spiritual welfare of their humble people at Alton, she was left in widowhood, and childless. She soon began a memoir of her husband which ill health prevented her from continuing; and again, years later, after the death of Julius Hare, she endeavored to go on with the work as a memorial of the two brothers, but age and infirmity compelled her to desist. Her materials, together with the records of her own life, she left in the hands of the author of this work, who was a nephew of her husband, and her dearly-loved adopted son, whom she took as her own while yet an infant, soon after the death of her husband. "In the last two years of her life," he says, "she yielded to my earnest wish that I might make her who had been the sunshine of my own life the central figure of the picture." This purpose he has carried out with admiring love and reverence, though not with all the consecutiveness desirable in the manner of execution. A large number of family connections and acquaintances of learning and culture are introduced, among whom are Baron Bunsen, Bishop Heber, Walter Scott and Wordsworth. A sister of Mrs. Hare was the wife of Bishop Stanley, and the mother of Dean Stanley. Between this sister and Mrs. Hare, as well as between her and the wives of Julius and Marcus Hare—the latter of whom was a sister of Bishop Stanley—the closest friendship existed to the end of their lives, and their correspondence forms a considerable part of the volume. Religion of the Calvinistic type was their great bond of union. All were, in that sense, devoutly pious. Reading of the Bible, repeating hymns, prayer, "sorrow for sin," struggling after "heavenly-mindedness and joy in God," seeking to have their lives "hid with Christ in God," "trying to be always praising God," together with anticipations of heaven and living for the next world,—these and the like were their constant exercises. While those of freer religious thought cannot but regret that so much fine feeling and culture should have been limited by notions so severe, it must be said that nowhere is to be found fuller consecration to the service of the poor and ignorant, in ameliorating their condition, and in instructing them in what was considered the true way of life.

A. H.

IT WILL BE REMEMBERED that the visiting members of the Evangelical Alliance, of whom the majority were from Great Britain, arrived in our city on election day. It is not known whether those who chaperoned them hither advised them of the fact, and of themanner of rejoicing over successful candidates with bonfires and bands of music; but an incident in connection with the visit suggests that at least one of the clergy from the mother country was ignorant of the customs of the land of the free. The delegate in question was speaking in Rev. Dr. Sunderland's church. During his discourse he took occasion to allude to the very generous reception they had received in every quarter. "Why," said he, "when we arrived in New York we found hosts of warm friends to greet us; as we came through Philadelphia the people turned out en masse; but I say with pride it was reserved for the good people of Washington to light bonfires on the streets to signal their joy and pleasure at our coming." Of course the remark provoked general laughter, and no doubt the learned divine smiled himself when the occasion of the bonfires was fully explained to him. What would the delegate think if he had landed on our shores on the 4th of July?—Washington, D. C., Star.

A. W. S. AND THE CATHOLIC FATHER.

I have read (in the last INDEX, December 25), with disappointment and surprise, the remarks of A. W. S. in reference to the allegations of the aforesaid Catholic father, that Christ differed from other great teachers, inasmuch as he allowed no deviation from the doctrines which he advanced; while Plato, Aristotle, Socrates, and other eminent philosophers, simply taught their doctrines and allowed their disciples to hold their own opinions. "This seems," says A. W. S., "to state the difference between Jesus and the other teachers quite fairly. There was an authoritative and oracular air about Jesus as a teacher, which, though impressive, is not agreeable to the rational mind. Even his 'Why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?' appears only to be an equivalent to—Don't you see, yourselves, that I teach nothing but the truth?" The italics here are mine. A. W. S. adds: "But how much better it is for every teacher to speak modestly, and not only to 'allow' but to encourage others to differ from him, when they feel they must!"

How our friend A. W. S. found in the passage quoted, or in the spirit of the teaching of Jesus, the assumption of such an exclusive authority is to me astonishing. Jesus had been teaching by a number of apt illustrations of the faithful and unfaithful servant, ending with the important truth, that "to whomsoever much is given, of him much shall be required." After remarks relative to the effects of his faithful ministry, and his own "baptism" of suffering, turning "to the people," he says: "When ye see a cloud rise out of the west, ye say, there cometh a shower; and so it is. And when ye see the south wind blow, ye say, there will be heat; and it cometh to pass. Hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky, and of the earth; but how is it that ye do not discern this time? Yea, and why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?" Obviously "equivalent" to saying, Ye can discern the signs of the sky and earth; how is it that ye do not discern the more important and significant events of the present time? Yea, and why, by the exercise of your own reason, do ye not judge what is right, in regard to these and all other events?

But where is the evidence that Jesus ever spoke by an "oracular" or reprehensible authority? On the contrary, he put himself precisely on a par with his disciples: "The disciple is not above his master; but every one that is perfect shall be as his master"—or, as Campbell has it, "every finished disciple shall be as his teacher."

The character of the authority exercised by Jesus is amply set forth in a concluding portion of his Sermon on the Mount, Matthew, chapter vii.: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. . . . What man is there of you whom, if his son ask bread, will give him a stone? or if he ask a fish will give him a serpent? If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him? Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them. . . . Beware of false prophets which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves. Ye shall know them by their fruits. . . . Every good tree bringeth forth good fruit, but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. . . . Not every one that saith to me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess to them, I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work iniquity. Therefore whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him to a wise man, which built his house upon a rock, and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house, and it fell not; for it was founded upon a rock. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened to a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand; and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house, and it fell; and great was the fall of it. And when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine, for he taught them as having authority, and not as the scribes." And why was this so? Plainly, because he uttered truth, and it was the AUTHORITY in the case, and the only legitimate and competent authority. His utterance indid not constitute its truth; it was that inherent dependent of his utterance.

I am the more grieved by the ground taken in this case by our friend A. W. S., as I have [illegible] notes and been pleased with the points made in [illegible] Comments."

Respectfully,

THOMAS LINTOCK.

PHILADELPHIA, 12 mo., 29, 187[illegible]

[illegible]e, we shall not [illegible] by-and-by make venture to speak for him; [illegible]ght, in case he a fuller statement of [illegible] deems it necessary. Yet we are constrained to express our general agreement with his view of the essential difference between Jesus and other teachers. Jesus is distinctly affirmed to have spoken "with authority," as one commissioned by God to state the absolute truth; and such authority is necessarily dogmatic. The "time" that he reproaches the people for not discerning was not the mere proclamation of general spiritual truth, but the coming of the Messiah in his own person. This involved his own position as a teacher and law-giver wholly unlike in kind all other great teachers in religion. To lose sight of this fundamental difference is to miss the main point of the Gospels.—ED.]

EMANCIPATION YET NEEDED.

We have among us a large class of men, high in the esteem of the community, and really estimable in many respects, who make public declaration that they have attained "the liberty wherewith Christ makes free," and who earnestly strive, in prayer-meetings and elsewhere, to persuade others to seek that same "liberty."

It is very unfortunate for the proselytes to this system that its teachers do not see (or, seeing, do not reveal) that the thing thus rejoiced in and eulogized as liberty contains many elements of bondage.

In the view of the theologico-religious system commonly known as "Orthodoxy," it is assumed as settled and certain, not only that the sincere receiver of that system attains, by the very act of receiving it, "the liberty wherewith Christ makes free," but that this "liberty" is the most precious of possessions, supremely beneficial, both for this world and the next. I wish to call attention to the fact that the thing thus christened "liberty" includes elements of bondage, and has an influence in some respects prejudicial both to the individual and to society.

By the prayer-meeting method of propagandism, in vogue for ten years past, and now carried on with increasing energy and effectiveness all over the country, the old process of "regeneration" is very much simplified—in appearance. Forty years ago, when a minister was arranging for or conducting a "revival," he gave elaborate explanations of "conviction, conversion and sanctification," representing these successive stages as all, and equally, essential to every believer. Now those who are persuaded to attend the prayer-meeting hear, instead, this one all-sufficient formula—"Give yourself to Jesus." The exhortations poured forth there are about equally divided between the necessity of doing this, and the undesirableness, uselessness, positive disadvantage of doing anything else, when the purpose is "to get religion." "Give yourself to Jesus. Do not attempt to improve or amend yourself, to break off ill habits or establish good ones, to take time for examination or reflection, to form plans or make resolutions, to do anything whatever. Give yourself to Jesus, and lie passive in his hand." This, it is confidently declared and repeated to the inquirer, is the only thing for him to do; and if, inspired with confidence by the easiness of the condition, he announces, at the end of a minute, or an hour, or a day, or a week, that he has given himself to Jesus, he is at once welcomed and rejoiced over as regenerate, redeemed from hell, a child of God and an heir of heaven.

The situation in which he now finds himself is suited to produce high exhilaration. The people to whom he has hitherto looked up as spiritual leaders, the elect of God, the salt of the earth and the light of the world, now welcome him as one of their own number, parade him before their meetings as one who "has attained," and assume his eternal blessedness to be thoroughly provided for. For a time, all he is expected to do in return is to stand up in the prayer-meetings, testify that he has "found Jesus," declare (what at that season is very likely true) that he is happier in this new possession than he ever was before, announce as an absolute certainty that this change was wrought and could have been wrought only by miraculous power exerted in his behalf, and beset his friends and acquaintance with solicitations to follow his example by giving themselves at once to Jesus. Success in more or fewer of these solicitations increases his happiness, and for a time nothing interferes with his perfect felicity.

The managers of these propagandist associations, however, understand very well that a new proselyte, like the one above described, must be kept for a while under careful guardianship, and within reach of steady manipulation. His new spiritual attainment, and his satisfaction in it, will avail but little for their purposes, unless he shall proceed to a regular course of doing the things that they do, and saying the things that they say; backing up, by word and deed, the assumptions of the group of churches whose theology they are banded together to uphold, and stifling any opposing testimony on the part of his conscience or his reason.

1. He finds, by degrees, that he is required to do certain things:—

He must join a church of the sort favored by the Association.

He must undergo (if he has not already done so) a form of water-baptism.

He must periodically observe a ceremony of eating bread and sipping wine with his fellow church-members.

He must "stand up for Jesus" by active participation in family devotion and in the prayer-meetings of the vestry and the Young Men's Christian Association.

2. He finds, by degrees, that he must take for granted and publicly declare certain things, repeating, and emphasizing, and insisting upon them as if they were unquestionably true: as—

That he, and "professors of religion" of his sort, are "God's people," "God's children" (made so, be it observed, not by creation, but by having "given themselves to Jesus"), and that the great mass of the community around him are sinners and children of the devil.

That hell is the natural and appropriate destiny of all men and women who continue, through this mortal life, in the natural use of the faculties of body, mind and soul, which God has given them.

That the collection of ancient writings called "the Bible" is in every part "the word of God," and is to remain the infallible and sufficient rule of life for all men in all coming ages.

That (in spite of abundant demonstration, internal and external, to the contrary), there are no absolute contradictions between different parts of this Bible, and no discrepancies which cannot be fairly reconciled.

That, since this Bible contains promises that whatever a man asks in prayer, believing, he shall receive, the believer must continue to maintain and affirm the actual fulfilment of these promises, even when his own experience and that of his brethren disproves them.

That one's knowledge, astronomically, that the earth is a satellite of the sun, need not and must not interfere with his belief, scripturally, that the sun was made after the earth, and for the purpose of giving light to it.

That when one and the same evangelist declares in different places, first that Jesus was born without human father, next, that Joseph and Mary were "his parents," and next that Mary, speaking to Jesus of Joseph, said, "thy father," all these are to be held as inspired of God and infallible truth.

That God (being kind and good), before he created men and women, prepared a lake of fire in which to burn millions of them forever.

That God (being just) laid upon the innocent the punishment of the guilty, and then received the guilty as innocent.

That God (being unchangeable) loves sinners, however great their guilt, encourages their penitence and seeks their welfare, up to the end of this mortal life; and then will begin to hate and torment certain millions of them, however small their guilt, will allow no benefit to follow repentance and reformation on their part, and will keep them sinning and suffering forever.

These are some of the elements of bondage inevitably implied in acceptance of the theological system known as "Orthodoxy." Teaching some truth, and bestowing some benefit upon its proselytes, it also inflicts upon them great injury, mentally, morally and spiritually, in proportion to the thoroughness with which it is accepted and acted on. In great numbers of persons it seems to accomplish a complete arrest of mental development; but it tends to injure the mind in all cases, because (as above cited) it requires the acceptance of many contradictory statements as both true, and equally proceeding from God; and it stigmatizes reason as "carnal," discouraging appeal to it in religious matters, and holding as true and essential many dogmas utterly unreasonable. By attributing to God unworthy characteristics and motives, and declaring his commission of many acts obviously unworthy, unjust and unkind, it tends to the moral deterioration of those who receive it. And it must injure, spiritually, those who accept such a view of our relation to God and our required service to him here, and of our relation to our fellow-men here and hereafter, as Orthodoxy insists on our accepting.

I repeat: there are many and most injurious elements of bondage in what ministers and exhorters call spiritual "freedom." They themselves need to be emancipated; and those who listen to them will do well to take counsel still of that reason which was divinely given them for a guide, in connection with those powers of spiritual discernment which make, with reason, the distinction between men and brutes.

A CRYING NEED.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Enclosed I send you three dollars for my subscription to THE INDEX for 1874.

Your discourse on "Church and State," in the issue for January 1, should be thrown into tract form, and scattered on the wings of every wind, as an eye-opener. So should your late reply to Mr. Gannett.

The Unitarians of New England to this day seem to feel and act as if they existed by the sufferance of the Orthodox, and were exceedingly grateful for the favor. Hence I consider their position as pusillanimous. The Radicals are tainted, to a degree, with the same fault.

The Church is organized like an army. If they have a document adapted to serve their purpose, they don't do as the Radicals do, print it and put so high a price on it that nobody cares to buy it. They print it, and by their efficient, organized agencies, put it into circulation cheaply.

We Radicals are eternally on the defensive. Each man does his poor share of fighting on his own hook, where his isolation, and consequent weakness, evokes the contempt of the Church. We never make a combined assault. Hiding behind the philosophy of evolution, which is slow in its motion, our tone is apologetic. The Orthodox know that they can chase us like sheep, not by argument, but with the supercilious look of authority. We are afraid of losing caste in society, and some of us are afraid of losing popularity, and bread and butter.

Ingersoll, of Illinois, is the wisest and bravest man of us all. His late speech at Chicago—how it rouses the manhood within us like a trumpet! Put an Ingersoll into every State of the Union, and how long would the Church stand before his assaults?

If you want the question at issue between the Church and the Republic settled without bloodshed, you must begin the discussion now among the people. And to get at them, you must organize for disseminating information, on the points at issue, by printed tracts. It grieves and angers me to see the utter, cold indifference of so many Radicals to the cause of the soul's freedom, while the Church is concentrating her forces to perpetuate the reign of superstition. All over the country, and especially in the great West, which is soon to give law to the republic, the minds of the people are hungering for information on this absorbing question of religion. But there is no provision made to meet this want! Radicals make money out of radical literature, and with some it seems to be their chief desire. They are camp-followers, not fighting soldiers in the van of a holy cause.

The early abolitionists travelled on foot and lectured everywhere. They held conventions, invited discussion from their opponents, raised funds by the penny or the dollar, and gave away tracts at cost. The souls of the women were fired with holy zeal, and they endured reproach, fatigue, and persecution —for what? To secure the personal liberty of four millions of slaves.

But in this new enterprise called the radical movement there are forty millions of people to be saved from the bondage of superstition—a bondage infinitely more degrading than the slavery of the negroes. There is a grand republic to be saved to liberty. Truth is to have the padlock taken from her lips; and Freedom is to be unchained. That mighty obstacle to human progress—the Church—is to be removed out of the way, not by sprinkling Unitarian rose-water on her bulwarks, but by such assaults of reason as Ingersoll makes.

Yet what are the radicals doing towards this great work? Comparatively nothing. They have become men of faith, and seem to be waiting to see the walls of Jericho tumble down miraculously, by the sounding of rams' horns.

You and Ingersoll are the only two men who seem to comprehend the real situation of things, and to be convinced that we must fight—with the spiritual weapons of argument and criticism, in order to avoid the last resort, the use of carnal weapons.

There ought to be a grand convention of the Radicals of all shades of opinion, to meet next May in St. Louis—the freest city on the continent,—to continue in session for at least three days, and to discuss, and determine upon, a line of policy to be pursued in the interests of human liberty as against the claims of the Church. If you are not a false prophet, deserving of contempt for trifling with the fears of the people, such a precautionary measure ought to be taken. Shall we have such a convention? Shall we organize to meet the coming danger? X.

THOUGHTS.

REV. DR. HEDGE places a low estimate upon Free Religion on account of its lack of spiritual faith. Faith in what? If he means lack of faith in dreaming rather than in working, we accept the criticism. When "vague, wavering capability is superseded by fixed, indubitable performance," then, and not till then, the man has faith in himself, and we faith in him. Other faith than that which is based upon knowledge, we confess we have not; and if this exposes us to Dr. Hedge's objection, we are indeed without spiritual faith.

DR. BARTOL says that "Free Religion frees, but does not feed." Whither, then, shall the human mind turn for the sustenance which it requires? To dogmas, the dry husks which have given it a semblance of nourishment in the past? Scientific truth is what the age demands, and Free Religion,—if it does not supply this, which may be doubted,—at least is willing to accept the proven fact, and help mightily in making it known. Does Christianity do more than this? Does it do as much?

THE CURRENT number of Frazer's Magazine contains a sharp and unprovoked criticism of John Stuart Mill's personal life, and of his ability as a writer. With the last we have nothing to do. His published writings are ample vindication. Si monumentum quæris, adspice. But when the critic sneers at what he terms Mr. Mill's over-estimate, his idolatry of his wife, he merits no reply. "Who can refute a sneer?" No one can read Mr. Mill's interesting Autobiography without being touched by the recital of his chivalric devotion and earnest, faithful love. It is at once an aspiration and an inspiration to feel that the nineteenth century has produced such an example of true marriage, and real helpful companionship. Already we know too much of ill-assorted unions, and of the misery and unhappiness that result from such associations, but not enough of such a one as this. Mr. Mill's manly recognition of his wife's help in the production of that noble essay, On Liberty, is treated by this critic as a whimsical notion; but the humane tone of that great monograph is a sufficient answer to the critic's flippant misjudgment. E. G. B.

THE WISCONSIN M. E. Conference has been dealing with a couple of members who had beguiled some of their brethren into losing investments in mining stocks. The Northwestern visits healthy reprobation on stock speculations generally, but confesses it does not expect that stock purchases by Methodist preachers will come to an end as long as Wall Street's chief operators continue to endow with their gains and their names some of the Methodist theological institutes that educate Methodist preachers.—Advance.

BUST OF

THEODORE PARKER,

BY

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Mr. Sidney H. Morse's new bust of Theodore Parker elicits warm commendation from all who are able to judge fairly of its merits. After long absence, so deeply felt by the thoughtful minds and generous movements of the age, those familiar features have reappeared, in a form that must perpetuate their functions as household treasure and public inspiration. For it is safe to predict that the meaning of this counterpart of the living man will keep pace with his growing fame, and bear successfully the tests of time. No presentment of him so genuine and real has before been given, and none more satisfactory is likely to be given hereafter. It is American in the noblest sense, and the American people, I am confident, will hasten to appreciate and cherish it.

It is not the least of our artist's triumphs that he has invested this head, moulded on a scale of only three-quarters the life size, with such apparent massiveness and real power, through the fine proportionality of each element to the sum of all, and to the unitary expression of real character, as well as through the vitality of the spirit that inspheres and animates the whole. If placed at that moderate height above the observer required by its scale of size, every aspect has a special fidelity; and those who look for the different sides of Parker's genius will not tire of recognizing the diversity. Prophet and scholar, enthusiast and patient worker in details, builder of right and scourge of wrong, rea y helper, genial humorist, loyal and tender friend, reverent lover of ideal and actual truth and good,—all are suggested in this marvellous reproduction with surprising fulness and force.—Samuel Johnson.

The usual temptation is to give a classic tone to a bust, though all the model Greeks are dead long ago, and their contour is not likely to be reproduced in Lexington. Mr. Parker was born there, a genuine New England man. He never looked like Sophocles, Aristotle or Homer. There was a curious reminiscence of the homely and insignificant nose of Socrates, and something too in the outline of the head. Mr. Morse neither flatters nor extenuates. He has made the living Parker as he was in moments of repose. Old friends can easily re-locate the tenderness which transpired in the corners of the lips, or the moral protest which brought them out before the tide of his speech.—John Weiss.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak, then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished in plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not orig mally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX, and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent, that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality.

With the Hope

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also, that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

Form a Liberal League,

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished.

"The Unitarians never had so good a paper as THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER is now. Mr. Mumford has the true editorial faculty, and makes a capital reading paper."—Springfield Republican.

"THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER—the Unitarian paper published in this city—shows every week that dulness is not a necessary accompaniment of a people who build mainly on a literature. The vivacity and humor which make THE REGISTER welcome to the 'masses' would have been thought something quite unseemly in the days of Channing and Ware. Its columns are liberally flavored with the best kind of nature, which, always and everywhere, is human nature."—Universalist.

The above are a few of the comments bestowed of late upon

$5 TO $20 PER DAY easily made by any one. We want men, women, boys, and girls all over the country to sell our fine Steel Engravings, Chromos, Crayon Drawings, Illuminations, Photographs, etc., etc. We now publish the finest assortment ever placed before the public, and our prices are marked down so low as to defy all competition. No one subscribes for a premium-giving paper in order to get a picture, after seeing our pictures and learning our prices. We have many old agents at work for us, who have made canvassing for books, papers, etc., their business for years, and they all report that they can make much more money at work for us than at anything else. Our prices are so low that all can afford to purchase, and therefore the pictures sell at sight at almost every house. New beginners do as well as agents who have had large experience, for our beautiful subjects and low prices are appreciated by all. To make large sales everywhere all an agent has to do is to show the pictures from house to house. Don't look for work elsewhere until you have seen what great inducements we offer you to make money. We have not space to explain all here, but send us your address and we will send full particulars, free, by mail. Don't delay if you want profitable work for your leisure hours, or for your whole time. Now is the favorable time to engage in this business. Our pictures are the finest and most pleasing in this country, and are endorsed by all the leading papers, including the New York Herald. Those who cannot give the business their entire attention can work up their own localities, and make a handsome sum without ever being away from home over night. ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE HIGH CHURCH people of England are so audacious as to talk of disciplining the Queen for partaking of the "Lord's Supper" with the Presbyterians. Why don't they discipline Jesus for partaking of it with Judas?

THE METHODISTS ask for $144,150 for "church extension" in 1874,—which shows that an extended church depends on extensive money. The sum is not too much to give in a good cause; but opinions will differ as to the special goodness of this one.

SAMSON IS SAID to have made a tremendous sensation among his enemies by tying fire-brands to the tails of three hundred foxes, and turning them loose into the corn-fields of the Philistines. The American Unitarian Association has accomplished the same result among its own ministers with only one Fox.

"GIVEN THAT the Catholic Church is a human institution, and nothing can be more surely predicated than her downfall." So says the Catholic Union, trusting that the Church is a divine institution. But reason refuses to consider her other than human. What fate, then, is in store for Catholicism?

ACCORDING TO Professor Schem's latest statistics, there are in the whole world 200,200,000 Roman Catholics, 106,300,000 Protestants, and 81,900,000 Greek and Oriental Christians. Christianity thus numbers (in a very loose way) 388,400,000 adherents out of an estimated world-population of 1,376,400,000.

SIXTY MINISTERS in New York have salaries of $5,000 or upwards. Ten of them get $10,000 or upwards. But it is probably true that the best men in the ministry are the poorest paid. It is not unobtrusive worth that commands the highest salaries, but generally the "smartest" tongues or the most fashionable manners.

THE BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE will hold a public meeting to-morrow evening, Friday, Jan. 23, at the Parker Fraternity Hall, corner of Berkeley and Appleton Streets, at 7 1-2 o'clock. The hearty thanks of the League are due to the Parker Fraternity for their generosity in affording the use of their noble Hall gratuitously. Let there be a rousing meeting. No one should be absent who is interested in the movement.

THE GERMAN novelist Freytag, in the magazine Im Neuen Reich, says of the struggle between the Papacy and the Empire: "This is no longer a struggle among men which may end in compromises and mutual tolerance, but it is a hostile collision of the two greatest ideas at which humanity has worked for nearly two thousand years. On the one side, the modern national State; on the other, the mediæval absolute domination over the souls of Christendom." The struggle between the Papacy and the Empire, however, is only one phase of the greater struggle between Christianity and Humanity. The true antithesis of the Church is the Republic, not the Empire; for the Church and the Empire both rest on the idea of personal government. Germany cannot carry out her struggle to its logical conclusion without establishing a true democratic republic. May she not be so dazzled by the military glories of the Empire as to forget her destiny!

THE BOSTON Pilot (Catholic) recently quoted Prof. Agassiz as authority for asserting that a majority of the professional prostitutes of Boston owed their fall to their attendance at the public schools. The Cleveland (Ohio) Leader in reply published a letter from Prof. Agassiz to Rev. T. B. Forbush, of that city, in which the former explicitly denied the statement attributed to him. The Pilot retorts that the statement in question was contained in an address delivered by the Professor before the Massachusetts State Teachers' Association in Lowell Institute, Boston, on Oct. 19, 1871; and it cites an editorial article in the Boston Herald, of Oct. 20, which (apparently) refers to this address. The Pilot also publishes a letter from Mr. P. R. Bliss, a pupil of Prof. Agassiz, who asserts that his instructor explicitly declared to him that, "in a majority of cases," the inmates of several houses of prostitution he had visited in his investigations "ascribed their fall to the licentious influences imbibed while pupils of the public schools." Now who is this Mr. P. R. Bliss, and what is his testimony worth as against Prof. Agassiz's own letter to Mr. Forbush? This letter, dated Cambridge, Oct. 18, 1873, says: "The item regarding the causes of the fall of the women of Boston, which you sent me some time ago, is a base invention and slander, which I should long ago have exposed, did I not shrink from a discussion with that class of people who indulge in such insinuations." If Agassiz's own word is good for anything, this outrageous imputation on our public schools ought to be universally branded as it deserves, though all the Catholics in Christendom swore to it. But if Mr. Bliss is to be trusted, it behooves the people of Massachusetts to institute an investigation of their schools so thorough as to ferret out the truth in a matter of such terrible moment. We have little doubt that the origin of the whole charge is Catholic hostility to free secular schools; but if not, it concerns every parent to know the truth. Was Prof. Agassiz's address ever published in full? If so, we shall be grateful for a copy of it. A graver question cannot be conceived than one which involves the moral influence of our public schools.

What is Christianity, and What Is It to be a Christian?

A DISCOURSE BY W. J. POTTER, DELIVERED BEFORE HIS SOCIETY AT NEW BEDFORD, DEC. 28, 1873.

Could we have been in the region of Western Asia eighteen hundred and seventy-three years ago this Christmas season, we should have stood right among the elemental materials out of which was to come the most powerful of the religions which the world has known. Still, I do not suppose that the wisest of us would have been able to detect in any of the passing events and incidents of the time anything so extraordinary as to betoken the advent of a new religion,—so hidden, noiseless, and subtile are the forces in which the great movements of history always begin. As little could we have detected in the landing of a small ship-load of Puritans in the wilderness of Massachusetts, two and a half centuries ago, the force that was to transform that wilderness into cities and farms and a civilized commonwealth; and as little, hundreds or thousands of years before that, could any imaginary observer, standing on the bare soil of this continent, have conceived that beneath his feet and in the atmosphere around him were then the elements out of which were to come in the lapse of time that primeval forest into which the Pilgrims came to make their home. Thus secretly do the great forces act, both in the world of Nature and humanity. Sometimes, indeed, there are volcanic outbreaks and earthquake shocks of revolution; but these, when we look at the long courses of history whether of mankind or of the material creation, are but occasionally appearing incidents, perhaps by some flaw of machinery, which in the end may be found neither to have much helped nor retarded the customary steady and gradual working of the silent forces. Revolution may seem to have accomplished most, because it attracts most attention; but the closer observer finds that progress by evolution is Nature's main reliance.

And it was in the silent operation of social and spiritual forces, which the historian may now trace, indeed, but which were not conspicuous to any casual observer of the day, that Christianity began. For if we had been living at the day I have named, eighteen hundred and seventy-three years ago this Christmas season, remember that it would have been thirty years—almost a generation—before Jesus began his public work of preaching, and a full generation before there was anything that could be called an organic beginning of the Christian Church; for that did not come until after Jesus' death. If any of us, then, could have been living at the time of the birth of Jesus, and had been travelling in Judea, and had chanced to tarry for the night in the little inn of the village of Bethlehem, possibly we might have heard in the morning, before resuming our journey, that a baby had been born in the night, in the manger of a stable near by, to a travelling peasant family, for whom there was no room in the inn. Possibly, I say,—for it is not at all certain that we should have heard of such an incident; and if we had, we should have had no thought that the nameless child lying there in the manger was to have a name known round the globe, and be reverenced as the founder of a religion which was to take possession of the strongest nations of mankind. If there had been, indeed, a procession of shepherds and wise men from the East to the spot to worship the babe, and the heavens had opened for angelic voices to announce its birth, such events must have been noised abroad, and would doubtless have come to our ears. But the Jewish historian of this era has no hint of any events like these, and there can be little doubt that they are a legendary reflection back from the after greatness, when the pious reverence of the popular heart gradually constructed out of its own consciousness a fitting dramatic entrance for such a life into the world. Beautiful and instructive as a legend, the careful historian will be slow to give to such incidents the credit of history. Hence, travellers might have left the little inn of Bethlehem on that morning, as for many a day and year afterward, without knowing or thinking anything of the babe in the manger there. More likely were they to have asked each other concerning the latest news from King Herod, who was then near his death, and to have talked together about the troubled times that would probably follow his decease, and about the new decree for taxing all the provinces which the Emperor Augustus had sent out from Rome, and on account of which Bethlehem village was then in unusual commotion. Thus they would have talked, and have little thought that the soil they were treading was that moment full of the germinating seeds of a new religious movement vaster, considering the whole compass of its consequences, than the world had ever known.

And what were some of these elemental forces which were thus in process of germination, but so secretly and silently as to escape observation until they could be seen in the results? No thoughtful student of Christianity of whatever creed will now, I believe, affirm that all these forces were contained in that little life which, wrapped in swaddling-clothes, lay there in the manger. Infant Christianity was not by any means wholly in the infant Jesus. However important and necessary his life may have been to its growth and development, Christianity began to be—at least the elements whence it sprang began—before he was born. And had our travellers been gifted with a subtlety of insight that could have matched the subtlety of these elements, they might have detected them there all through Judea, and made them the subject of their talk instead of King Herod's probable death and Augustus Cæsar's tax-decree. And yet in these very names, Herod and Cæsar, they unconsciously touched some of the elements that were working toward the formation of a new religion. For it was largely through the spread of the Roman Empire under the Cæsars, by which the partition-walls between nations, races, religions, and cultures were broken down, and people of different civilizations, of different stocks and worships and modes of thought and living, were brought together into a hitherto unaccustomed acquaintance and intimacy, that the way was prepared for the broader religious ideas and larger fellowship which Christianity introduced and grafted upon the old Hebrew faith: nay, let me say that it was by this new acquaintance of the hitherto separated nations and faiths that these broader religious ideas and larger spiritual fellowship were generated and nurtured. There is a deep significance in that little phrase with which Luke begins his account of the birth of Jesus,—"that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that all the world should be taxed." "All the world" (that was considered of any account) had then come under the sway of one government. And this almost universal unity of civil rule has a direct historical connection with the universality of the religious principle proclaimed by Jesus and Paul, and finally winning the day over Jewish resistance, by which Christianity was to embrace both Jew and Gentile, Scythian and barbarian, bond and free. When we consider how jealously the Jews had always guarded their religion from any foreign admixture, how they had regarded themselves as a peculiar people of the Lord, for whom to lose national identity was not only a calamity but a sin, and how they had striven to keep their borders intact and to preserve their isolation not only in respect to their faith but in respect to blood and social life, we see that it would have been indeed a marvel for Christianity to have come out of Judaism, had not Judaism previously lost something of this old exclusiveness and isolation.

And as a matter of fact, the Jews had been losing, for several centuries before the Christian era, in spite of all their efforts to resist the process, very much of this isolation and exclusiveness. First, by their captivity in Babylon they had come into contact with the then powerful faith of Persia, by which their own religion became modified in some very important particulars; of which there is clear evidence in the apocryphal Old Testament and in the New Testament representation of the doctrines of the Pharisees, the largest and most popular of the Jewish sects at the time of the advent of Jesus. Notably, for instance, the important doctrine of immortality, to which there is little reference in the canonical Old Testament, is found clearly stated in the apocryphal Old Testament, and, coupled with the doctrine of the bodily resurrection of the dead, was the common belief of the Pharisees before Jesus came. This belief most likely was imbibed, or at least more expressly developed than ever before, during the captivity in Persia. From the same source appear to have come the doctrines of a day of judgment, of a satanic power, and of demoniac possession, of angels as messengers between heaven and earth, and of an irrepressible conflict in the universe between two essentially hostile principles, good and evil, light and darkness. Then, later, when the Roman Empire extended its sway in the East and Judea became a province of the Cæsars, Judaism was brought into a very different contact with the religion, philosophy, and culture of the then Western world,—that is, with the thought and faith of Greece, especially as these had found expression in the Neo-platonic philosophy of the city of Alexandria, whither many of the Jews went when the boundaries of their old nation were invaded and broken down. From this source, in particular, came the doctrine of the Logos, or the Divine Word, which plays such an important part in the fourth Gospel, and was the root whence sprang the doctrine of the miraculous incarnation of Jesus, and afterwards that of the Trinity. This Logos doctrine, too, became a very important agency in spiritualizing the Jewish Messianic idea, and hence helped largely to commend Christianity to the Western Gentile mind, to which that idea in its literal and original form was a great stumbling block.

We see, then, that, first by the exile in Babylon, and then by the spread of the Roman Empire, in that little strip of country in Western Asia, eighteen hundred and seventy-three years ago, several distinct streams of social, civil, and religious life had come to confluence, and were intermingling in numberless ways their constituent elements. Here were not only three great and influential faiths of the ancient world, but two of the three great race-stocks, the Shemitic and the Aryan, contributed the results of their thought and experience to the common mass of impressions that went into the life of the day. These different elements of thought and faith, these once separate forces of spiritual influence, now brought together, and having been more or less intermingling for years and generations already, could not help but act and react upon each other, thus silently shaping themselves out of the chaotic mass into a new faith, and generating a new and more hospitable and more salubrious spiritual atmosphere. And King Herod himself, who, in spite of his selfish intrigues and barbarous cruelties, was yet an able and for the age a cultivated man, and who was a faithful viceroy to Rome, was a direct helper to this result. While striving to conciliate the Jews by beginning the rebuilding of their Temple and protecting them in their worship, he yet welcomed foreigners to Jerusalem, especially cherished anything that savored of Greek and Roman culture, and opened the sacred city freely to pagan forms of worship. And in the midst of all this commingling of faiths, ideas, sentiments, old traditions and tottering institutions, there was that wonderful expectation, chiefly Jewish but partly Persian, which pointed to a Messianic deliverer,—the speedy coming of some person who was to be the lawfully anointed and recognized king of the Jews, and who in some way should rescue Judea from the sway of a foreign power and restore the Hebrew theocracy in all the glory of its ancient sovereignty.

Thus may we sketch the chief of the elemental materials which, eighteen and three-quarters centuries ago, a keen insight might have detected in the Roman provinces of Asia as silently taking their places in the formation of a new system of faith: and these are the direct antecedent forces out of which Christianity came.

Into this time, with its rare commingling of beliefs and traditions, of mental and spiritual influences previously operating apart, Jesus was born. Amid this rare combination of religious elements he was bred and grew up to manhood, sharing with his countrymen the Messianic expectation. Well-born, though of peasant stock, learning little probably from books, more from observation of man and nature, and more still from the depths of his own consciousness and from that spirit of wisdom which voices itself through the human soul, he grew up a rare religious genius and prophet—the man for the hour. Reformer and saint in one person, combining a masculine robustness of energy with womanly gentleness, a sage's intuitive perception of truth with a philanthropist's love of blessing his fellow-men, he became the fitting prophet of the time, and was to hundreds and thousands of souls the gratefully accepted fulfilment of their Messianic expectations. Not so much creating the era as its product, he was yet a true representative of the era. The elements of the new faith were all there, we may say, brought together by natural causes. But his strong personality supplied the fusing, magnetic touch that was needed to set these elements into the attitude of crystallization. Taking his teachings and life together, his character combined in fine proportions the various constituents of the new faith that was springing into existence, so that he became its natural representative and interpreter to the popular mind: while the Jewish Messianic commission, which at last, after some apparent hesitation, he claimed to possess, though doubtless in a spiritual sense, gave him the necessary instrumentality for securing a firm hold for his teaching upon the popular heart. And this claim, made by him or for him, that he was the expected Messiah, became the organic centre around which the new religion shaped itself. To confess him to be the Messiah, the Christ, was the one outward test of discipleship; and, after his death, upon this confession by his followers that he was the Christ, the Church began to be organized, and from this confession the new-born religion, after a few years, was named Christianity,—meaning, logically and etymologically, "the religion of Jesus, the Christ."

And through all the centuries since Christianity thus began its historic career, though in its natural development and progress it has adopted many beliefs and customs and ideas that were foreign to its origin, and has assimilated itself to the culture and temperament of nations that at first resisted it, and, while fastened on one side to the authority of tradition, has been open on the other to the progressive thought of modern civilization, thereby undergoing very important changes in its inner structure of sentiment and doctrine, yet, through all changes whether by natural development from within or adoption from without, it has retained as its organizing centre of belief this old confession, interpreted in some sense, of Jesus as the Christ,—not, perhaps, Jesus as the expected Hebrew Messiah, but Jesus as Savior, as spiritual King and Lord, as an exceptionally commissioned Revealer of spiritual truth to the world.

Were I therefore to sum up an answer to the question, What is Christianity?—considering it, as an answer true to the philosophy of history ought to consider it, in its sources antecedent to its actual organization as well as in its historic career since the primitive days of its birth, my answer would be, if I may be allowed to quote substantially from a statement I have previously made in print, that it is "a fluent spiritual force, the momentum and resultant of many confluent religious and moral ideas, and of many generations of thought and sentiment and action,—not confined to Hebrew history alone, nor beginning with Jesus, yet coming to specific organization and activity through the instrumentality of the Hebrew Messianic idea, and through the great religious genius and power of the Hebrew prophet, Jesus of Nazareth, as the accepted representative of the Messianic office; not leaping, however, as a complete, organic system even from his brain and heart, but enlarging and essentially transforming the Messianic conception, its own instrument, in order to meet the religious demands of the age; and, as it proceeded in its organization, assimilating to itself various other ideas and modes of thought foreign to the Hebrew faith and to the views of Jesus; receiving in its course contributions from different climes and nations and persons and philosophies, and modifying its nature as well as its volume by these fresh increments to its constituent elements, until it has grown from a small, despised, persecuted, and, to our modern ideas, a somewhat ascetical and fanatical Jewish sect, into the gigantic religious and social power, interpenetrating almost all modern life with its influence, and modern civilization with its machinery, which we see Christianity to be to-day."*

But perhaps it will be said that this is rather to define Christianity in its exterior features and progress than to touch its essence: to which I reply that when I call it, not a doctrine nor a church nor a miraculously interjected special revelation in history, but a fluent moral and spiritual force, taking shape in various doctrines and churches, and expressing itself by progressive natural revelation in history, I include and touch its inner vital essence, whatever it be. That which makes it a moral and spiritual force, and gives it its power in history, is its life-giving essence. Moreover, it must be said that each of the great specific religions of the world, and Christianity like the rest, has two essential principles, both of which have been necessary to its vitality and power,—first, that which is the essence of all religions, a sense of human relation to the Infinite, which sense expresses itself in certain sentiments of faith and duty which are found in all religions, and may be said to be the common property of human nature; and, second, that which is peculiar to each religion, and makes it by some special belief or claim the specific religion it is, separate and distinct from all other religions. In other words, each of the religions has more or less of certain universal moral and spiritual truths by which it is connected and shown to be of the same kindred with all other religions; and it has also certain specific beliefs of its own which separate it from all other religions and make it antagonistic to them. For instance, we may say that Judaism expressed the essence of its universal truth in the command, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, etc., and thy neighbor as thyself;" and many would say that the essence of Christianity may be expressed by the phrase, "Love to God and man,"—Jesus himself quoting this old twofold Jewish commandment as containing the substance of his teaching. Here, then, is an essential truth in which the two religions agree. But in their specific claims they fall apart,—Judaism believing that a special revelation of religious truth was made through Moses which has never been superseded; while Christianity claims that another revelation was made through Jesus abrogating in some respects, and only enlarging in others, the law of Moses. Looking, again, at certain moral and spiritual truths, such as faith in divine Providence, belief in the spirituality of Deity, the perception of moral obligation and of moral obligation as superior to mere outward religious observance, the hope and conviction of immortality, we find them alike in Judaism, Christianity, Brahminism, Mohammedanism, and other religions: in these truths, though they may be differently expressed and emphasized, these religions are one. But in respect to the specific claims made for persons, prophets, sacred books, forms of worship, they separate and oppose each other.

Now there is a tendency among the liberal and progressive minds of all faiths to define their religion by its universal rather than by its special beliefs,—to proclaim, in fact, its universal truth to be its distinguishing characteristic, and to leave out of view the special doctrines that have given it a distinct career in history. This tendency, from a practical point of view, is exceedingly encouraging, as showing that liberal minds of all religions are coming into essential agreement on the great fundamental principles of faith and morals, and are actually forgetting the barriers that have been keeping their religions apart. But if one cares for accuracy in historical truth, the tendency must be regarded as a violation of both the philosophy and the facts of history. "Love to God and man" may be, for example, the most important element in Christianity; but it is simply untrue to say that it is its distinguishing element, since the sentiment, as well as the phrase itself, is expressly borrowed from Judaism, and the idea is found in other religions. Nor is it any adequate account of the historical beginning of Christianity to say that Jesus preached and illustrated this idea with special emphasis, though he did that; for without the conception that he was the Messiah, which made the central thought, belief, hope, around which Christianity first organized itself, it is more than doubtful whether anything he preached or did would have become the basis of a new religion. The Messianic office which he was believed to hold, and the hope of the Messianic kingdom which it was believed would soon be inaugurated by him, furnished at least the actual animating impulse that moved the popular heart. The universal truth was indeed the vital substance, or soul, of the new faith; but the special claim was that which gave it a body and organs, necessary at the time, for putting itself into communication with the world.

But the point here considered can be best illustrated, perhaps, under the form of another question, What is it to be a Christian? Wendell Phillips, to give an example of one of the most liberal answers to this question, thinks that the essence of Christianity is in one line of the New Testament: "Bear ye one another's burdens;" and that man, he says, is a Christian, though he be called or call himself infidel, "whose life and ethics grow out of this central root of Christianity." But when I look into the liberal and enlightened interpretations of other religions, I find a similar definition of the genuine disciple there. The progressive Jews, of whom we have now many distinguished and devoted representatives in this country, say that the essence of Judaism "consists in truth, benevolence, and justice." Rabbi Wise writes thus: "'Love thy neighbor like thyself,' together with the golden rule of Confucius, Hillel, and Jesus, is contained and expounded in the Ten Commandments, of which the understanding is the interpreter, conscience the expounder, and love the eloquent pleader." And again, "The happiness of mankind depends on no creed and no book: it depends on the dominion of truth, which is the Redeemer and Savior, the Messiah and King of Glory." Dr. Ellinger, editor of the Jewish Times, says that "the true spirit of Judaism is the religion of the universe," and that it aims to make men "loyal only to truth," and disposed to act "for the common benefit of humanity at large." The definition of a genuine Jew to be drawn from these statements is that he is one who accepts truth as the revelation of God, and lives to love and bless his fellow-men. A recent liberal interpreter of the Mohammedan faith says,—"Islam and Christianity both aim at the same results—the elevation of mankind." One of the sects of Mohammedanism declares that God is to be served only through love of Him, and that "man is nearest to God when his soul is wrapped in the devotions of Universal Love." Says the writer I have already quoted, addressing himself to both Christians and Mohammedans, "Why not then henceforth adopt the words of the prophet of Arabia as the motto of Humanity:—'Try to excel in good works; when ye shall return unto God, He will tell you as to that in which ye have differed.'" And his book shows that he will call that man a true Mohammedan who lives according to the broad, unsectarian spirit of this motto. A modern Buddhist, for several years a Minister of State in Siam, says,—"The holy religion of Buddha is perfect justice springing from a man's own meritorious disposition, which rewards the good and punishes the evil." "Whoever endeavors to keep the Commandments [the five Buddhist commandments are all ethical], and is charitable, and walks virtuously, must attain heaven." This is his definition of what it is to be a follower of Buddha. Liberally cultivated Hindus, Confucians, Parsees, may be found who will give essentially the same description of what it is to be a genuine devotee of their respective faiths; that is, each of them defines his own faith by its universal and not by its special elements. We have therefore this singular result,—that the questions, "What is it to be a Christian?" "What is it to be a Jew?" "What is it to be a Mohammedan?" "What is it to be a Buddhist?" etc., receive from liberal minds, that take these respective names, substantially the same answer. There is a difference of words, but the words are defined as identical in meaning.

Now, such definition, while it is to be welcomed as showing that dogmatism and bigotry and sectarianism are passing away, and that all the great faiths of the world are slowly converging to common grounds of fellowship, does not seem to me logical in theory nor just in practice: not logical in theory, because it leaves out of view just that which has given rise to the religious names to be defined, and makes the actual distinction between them; and not just in practice, because it assumes, or appears to do so, that a quality of character and life, which is the aim of all the great religions, and is really found to some extent in all, is the exclusive property of one, and may rightly be appropriated by the name of that one. If the names really mean the same thing, and may rightly be defined by the universal elements which each includes, then why insist on the necessity of keeping so many different names? And if the names are insisted upon, then is there not some underlying special claim to authority made by those thus insisting, for their own religious name over that of others, though it be not confessed in their definition?

Once I was disposed, like Mr. Phillips and many other liberal minds of Christendom, to say that to be a Christian was simply to love God and man, and to exhibit that love in character and life as Jesus did; that it was to stand in his attitude of filial trust and obedience to divine power, and of fraternal helpfulness towards humanity. As to the narrower theological meanings that are commonly given to the word in the Evangelical sects of Christendom, these I never accepted. I could not believe that to be a Christian it was necessary to have faith in the atoning blood of Jesus, or to adopt any other of the peculiar Orthodox doctrines concerning him, or to pass through any process of so-called "conversion." I did not see, as I do not to-day, that Jesus taught any of the theological systems that have been popularly accepted in the Christian Church; but it appeared to me, as it still does, that though he taught some things which my reason cannot accept, the great emphasis of his teaching was against a theological and ecclesiastical type of religion, and for a religion that should be eminently moral, spiritual, practical. Hence it seemed to me that to be a Christian, or a follower of Christ, was to strive after these gracious, spiritual virtues which he possessed,—to have his disinterested earnestness and devotion, his gentleness, his purity, his power to rebuke iniquity, his love and self-sacrifice; it was to live like him, to bear witness to the truth, and to go about doing good to one's fellow-men. And doubtless there are many calling themselves "Christian" to-day to whom this definition suffices. But when I came to see that many Jews, and Buddhists, and Mohammedans, and those of other faiths, were saying that to be a true Jew, a true Buddhist, a true Mohammedan, and so forth, was to have these same qualities of character, and that not a few among them were really exhibiting these qualities in their lives, I saw that there must be some defect in the logic which defined the word "Christian" as synonymous simply with these general qualities of fine-toned spiritual character, and that I had really no just right to call these qualities exclusively by the name of the religion in which I had chanced to be bred. Therefore latterly I have dropped the use of the word "Christian" as defining my religious position. Since I plant myself on the principles of natural religion, and believe that they will suffice to account for all the phenomena of religious history, and since I believe that Christianity, though considered in all its breadth and elasticity, the greatest and noblest of all the religions, yet came in the natural order of historical development, and in the same way that other religions have arisen, and, since I believe that all the religions, though none is infallible, have given expression to valuable spiritual and moral truths, and all have their providential place in the education of mankind, and since I believe that Jesus, though, take him all in all, he seems to me greatest of religious teachers and prophets, and has left an influence for righteousness that can never die out of the world, yet stands a natural man in the natural line of humanity, one of a company of rare spiritual geniuses that have appeared in various races and nations, inspired of that Universal Wisdom which, "in all ages, entering into holy souls, maketh them friends of God and prophets,"—since I believe these things, I cannot consistently assume a name which appears to me to accord to Jesus an exceptional and unique position in the world's history as a specially commissioned revealer of religious truth, and to set apart the religion which dates itself from his birth as having a different authority from that of the other religions of the world.

Of course there is one sense of the word in which we are all called "Christians,"—all of us, at least, who have been born in the limits of Christendom and of Christian genealogy. All who are thus descended and born, no matter what their opinions or character, are counted in the census of the world as "Christians." But this is rather a civil than an ecclesiastical or theological use of the word. In this sense one who may call himself "infidel," or "atheist," is reckoned as a "Christian." Much less is it a religious sense of the word,—for cases are known where men, taking credit to themselves for their lineage, have claimed, even with a blasphemous oath, and with a spirit that seemed to savor of anything but fraternal love, that they were "Christians," and no such "vile stock" as Jews and Pagans! But such a claim to the word—the claim of mere genealogy—probably no church would recognize as valid unless something else should go with it. But from this fact of genealogy there comes another sense of the word "Christian" which satisfies some liberal minds. They say that all the people of Christendom, who have been born and bred under any kind of spiritual influences, have imbibed something from Christianity—a spirit, a power, an educating bias and sway—which has even unconsciously helped to shape their characters, and entered into the very substance of their being. And on this ground, though they may believe in the natural origin and growth of Christianity, they think they have a sufficient title to the "Christian" name. This fact of spiritual inheritance I readily admit, but question the logic that draws the inference as to the name; and if this is our only title to the name, I do not think it is a right which we shall feel impelled very urgently to defend. The fact, however, that we here, as most of the people of Europe and America, stand in direct spiritual connection with Christianity, and have drawn through its channels most of the spiritual food (though by no means all the mental food) that has helped to build up our characters, is a fact not to be forgotten; and a fact which I certainly most gratefully remember. So long at least, and as often, as this Christmas season comes round, can we not forget what the world owes and what we especially owe to the saintly and heroic life of him whose birth the festival commemorates; nor forget that the religion which bears his name, notwithstanding all the corruptions that have gathered about its history, and all the errors its sects have taught, and all the cruel persecutions and theological bitterness that have attended its career, has yet had the grand ideal aim of that old legendary song, which sung itself into the faith of the early Church, "Peace on earth, good-will to men."

But I like to remember, too, that this Christmas festival, which popularly is believed to celebrate only Christian truths and traditions, has elements which can be directly traced to other sources. The evergreens with which we deck our dwellings and the churches are a relic of a custom among the Druids of ancient Britain; the domestic Christmas tree hung with gifts seems to have its roots in the soil of ancient German traditions; and many of the merry features of the festival—probably the very date of it—have their ancestry in the Saturnalia of pagan Rome. So, although Jesus stands the central majestic figure in the celebration of the day, the celebration also shows how wide and deep run the roots of the religious beliefs and institutions in which we have been bred, and furnishes a beautiful testimony to the unity of religious development and the solidarity of religious faith.

And now these various religions of the world seem to have come to that point in their development, or are rapidly approaching it, when, in order to attain this ideal aim of unity and peace, they are destined to shed their mutually conflicting and antagonistic claims. These in the past have had their use, but are now fast being outgrown. The tendency of which I have spoken, to define the religions by their universal rather than by their special elements, is evidence that the several faiths are advancing towards this era of reconciliation. When such liberal minds as those from whom I have quoted shall come to see that under their different names they are including really the same ideas and aiming at the same practical good, they will not long suffer the names, which are a reminder of differences no longer existing, to keep them apart. The names will drop off, as naturally as leaves are shed in autumn. Or if the name shall linger, as sometimes we may see leaves lingering upon a tree even into spring, it is sure to be pushed off when the new spring of faith shall really come. The old elements of religion, which to many seem to be decaying, are as alive as they ever were. They are leaving old creeds and institutions, but they are silently entering into new combinations for a period of fresh growth and productiveness. But meantime, let those who are not yet ready to drop the name, those for whom the word "Christian" is so spiritually vital, or has such tender associations that they cannot part with it—let these put into the word all the good, broad, sweet, unsectarian meanings that are possible. Let them put into it all the good ideas by which earnest-minded, true-hearted, and loving people of all faiths strive to live. Let those of other religious names do the same thing. And ere long the broad and good meanings will burst the vessels that have been holding them, and the sweet incense will be wafted from church to church and from man to man, and by the freed common fragrance it will be discovered that the faiths so differently named are no longer strangers and enemies, but friends and brothers.

* Essay on "Christianity and its Definitions" in The Radical, for February, 1870,—in which, and in an Essay on "The Natural Genesis of Christianity," published in the Annual Report of the Free Religious Association for 1871, the main ideas of this discourse were stated and further elaborated.

HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES.

"THE UNCONSCIOUS SIDE OF OUR LIFE."

BY SAMUEL LONGFELLOW.

The second lecture in the free religious course in Horticultural Hall was given yesterday afternoon by the Rev. Samuel Longfellow. He said that the power of self-directed thought, self-controlled virtue, is one of the chief features which distinguish man from the lower animals. That alone is felt to be a noble life which is self-trained to noble ends. Mr. Emerson long ago sounded our tocsin note when he said, "Trust yourself; every heart vibrates to that iron string." In the Bible we find the words, "Trust your own soul." "Every man must work out his own salvation." There are thousands of influences which carry us beyond our own will. Besides the self-conscious, self-knowing, there is another element of our life which is unconscious, spontaneous, receptive. Such are our physical functions, and still higher is that of unconscious cerebration, such as thinking in our sleep, or dreams, or the familiar experience of drowning persons, when all their past lives seem to flash through their minds in an instant. The idea of the lecturer was that the mind retains not the details and single impressions, but only the resultant of them; that it only retains what it has once used. In the somnambulistic state the brain carries on processes nominally done only by force of the will. In composition we often lay aside the pen, and the brain flows on in uninterrupted thought. We could not by effort construct or compose the best things which flow out of our mind. There is a constant tendency for things to pass from the conscious to the unconscious state, and that which is repeatedly done by effort becomes at last spontaneous. In any art a man is not a master until he has left behind the stage of definite volition for the stage of spontaneity. We forget rules because we absorb them. The best pictures strike us as not being constructed, but as a growth from within. So good style in writing must have ceased to be a definite recollection of rules. The teacher of elocution often strikes us as artificial in manner because he keeps his rules and methods in mind. This is not the result of art but the visibility of art. We hear of the art which conceals art, but art becomes concealed by concealing itself, and thus becoming latent. There is one thing which is as important as to get training; that is, to forget it. Rules have their uses, but they are the outgrowth of experience, not its creator, as language came before grammar, reason before logic, or the star before astronomy. Before becoming useful a man's learning must become assimilated in knowledge. All organic action appears to us more free than intended action. The speech of an orator is not eloquent, and does not carry us with it until it has carried him with it. This it is which lifts mechanical work into artistic creation. Genius is but the happy organization which makes this recurrent and frequent. There are few men so well born but that they must pass through the stage of self-discipline. Virtue does not become that goodness and holiness we love until the stage of discipline has passed and virtue becomes organic and spontaneous. Perhaps this may be the truth in regard to the doctrine of the churches relating to regeneration; but they make it falsehood by insisting that there is no light but that which passes through church windows, no pure water except from church spouts; by their contempt for natural goodness, insisting that that only is the genuine article which is created by their evangelical fires. Not merely is spontaneity the result of self-discipline, but also the result of methods. We must trust ourselves. The realm of influences is set over against the realm of effort. We do not become good so much by trying to be good as by forgetting ourselves and our goodness; just as bodies grow, not so much by exercise as by the influence of light and air and electricity which they absorb. Who does not know of the influence of associations, of persons who bring out unconsciously what is best in us, of others what is worst, and of others who chill and repress us? Characters are moulded by the character of the society and community in which they live; nor by the communities alone, but by the whole realm of spirits. There are secret and mysterious influences which touch us from sources beyond our cognizance, and beyond all these must surely be the Supreme Spirit. Among the laws of unconsciousness there are two without which our natures would not be healthful and true. The first is that unconsciousness shall remain unconscious. If we try to watch these powers, to discover their sources, they fail us and we find not what we seek. And so we ought to allow the influences of unseen spirits, let them remain indefinite and unsought, because we otherwise lay ourselves open to all conditions of error and untruth. Another law is that of temperance. If without the guardianship of the conscious will we give ourselves up to impulse we become the victims of caprice, fancy, mere feeling. No man has the right to give up self-control entirely, not even to the Divine will. We sometimes see a man completely dominated by another's will. This is the murder of a soul. Kings may abdicate their thrones, but no man has a right to abdicate his soul. He must always keep his sceptre within reach. We are not to give up our control even to the Supreme Spirit. God has not asked it, for he has given us self-conscious thought and self-controlling will. We are not mere receptacles but recipients of his light. He asks not broken, crucified wills, but consecrated wills. Selfishness, not self, must be extinguished. Thus between two sets of forces does our life round on in its dim and perilous way; perilous but not unguarded. All the burden of the misdoer lies not at the door of the conscious will. We must leave it for God to judge how far circumstances, birth, education, made him what he is. We cannot descend into any hell of passion or disobedience but He is there in his retribution to warn us back to life. For in help as in retribution—while we work out our own salvation by our own way—it is always God who is working in us.—Advertiser, Jan. 12.

"LOUIS AGASSIZ, TEACHER."

The will of Agassiz begins thus: "The last will and testament of Louis Agassiz, of Cambridge, in the County of Middlesex and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, teacher." We should think the heart of every school-master and school-mistress in the land would bound at reading this simple announcement. The great naturalist, the peer of Aristotle, Linnæus, Cuvier and Von Baer, calls himself, in the most solemn of all documents, "a teacher." There is, to us, something inspiring in this designation. All teachers, whether they are professors in colleges or directors in the commonest village schools, must be thrilled and invigorated by the statement that Agassiz is proud to enroll himself in their ranks. The good, grand, noble man, the apostle of pure science, the investigator and discoverer, the person who was preëminently a scientific force as well as a scientific intelligence, dies with the feeling that his occupation was that of a "teacher." He, of course, leaves little or no property to his family; the noble woman, the bereaved wife, the constant companion of his intellect as well as of his heart, she who followed him whithersoever he was led by the spirit of scientific research, is, we suppose, the executrix of little but his glory; but the will is sublime, because it records the fact that Louis Agassiz was "a teacher." That was his occupation on earth. What it may be above, we do not pretend to know. One thing we know is this, that the simple preamble to his will must kindle into a generous flame every soul engaged in the great cause of education. "Louis Agassiz, teacher"! but what a teacher! We preserve many memories of precious conversations with him on this question of teaching. He considered that teaching was a communication of life as well as of knowledge. A lad of ten years once contrived to get into the State House when Agassiz was urging the incontrovertible arguments for his "Museum." We happened to jostle against the lad, as he was leaving the hall, and asked him, laughingly, his opinion of the performance. "Well," he said, "I've been to many lectures, and have been tired to death, but Agassiz comes right up to my notion of the circus!" When we told Agassiz of this queer compliment, he was much pleased. He wanted to see the boy who had been so unconsciously appreciative of the spirit of his speech. He knew that he had magnetized grave and elderly men, and that what he asked for would be cheerfully granted; but he desired to shake hands with the lad who thought he was as good as "a circus," and sent out from his deep lungs great roars of laughter in welcoming the testimony of his juvenile admirer.

It would be idle to multiply instances of the thorough humanity and geniality of Agassiz. Everybody who knew him can tell hundreds of anecdotes illustrative of his sympathy with all forms of life, whether in the jelly-fish, the human child, the developing boy or girl, the mature man or woman. Still his conviction of the immateriality and personality of mind was something wonderful in so austere a naturalist. We happened once to please him by defining a jelly-fish as organized water. "Now look at it through the microscope," he said. "But, Agassiz, the play of the organization is so wonderful that it seems to me that nothing but mind can account for it." "You are right," was his answer; "in some incomprehensible way, God Almighty has created these beings, and I cannot doubt of their immortality any more than I doubt of my own." His fealty to the rights of animals exceeded that of any great naturalist who ever preceded him. Incompetent as we are to give him his due rank among the great naturalists of the world, we think he excelled every naturalist who has gone before him in striking at the soul and individuality of all animals below man. It is impossible to convey in words the peculiar feeling which Agassiz had on this matter. Doubtless this large and genial genius is now satisfied. We cannot penetrate beyond the vail.

What we can do, however, is to celebrate Agassiz as a teacher, and try to send a new glow into the heart of every person engaged in the difficult art of teaching. How hard is their work! The present generation is brought up, as far as education is concerned, on the most economical principles. No consideration whatever is given to the point of the will of Agassiz. When he proudly calls himself "a teacher," he means that he is a radiator of heat as well as of light. A poet has well described the method of instruction adopted by Agassiz:—

> "He was like the sun giving me life;
> Pouring into the caves of my young brain
> Knowledge from his bright fountains."

VINELAND LIBERAL LEAGUE.

VINELAND, Jan. 6, 1874.

The Vineland League met as usual in Plum Street Hall, the President in the chair.

The minutes of last meeting were read and approved. The Secretary read a communication from the Boston Liberal League, and a tract published by them entitled "An Appeal for Equal Taxation and no Exemption." It is a valuable document, plainly setting forth the dangerous tendencies towards a moneyed ecclesiasticism fostered by the present system of church exemption.

Dr. Coonley reported a conversation held with one of the teachers in the Normal School at Trenton, regarding the use of the Bible in the public schools, which, while it showed a clinging to old habits, plainly indicated a desire for more light upon many important topics.

The committee in charge of the mass meeting reported progress, and proposed holding the adjourned meeting in Merchant's Hall on Tuesday evening next, Jan. 13.

The Secretary then read the proposed Religious Freedom Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which was heartily endorsed by the League. Said amendment reads as follows:—

ARTICLE I.

Section 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Section 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or be disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequenee of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

Section 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this article by appropriate legislation.

Mr. Edwards proposed to amend our By-Laws so as to hold our meeting the first Tuesday in every month instead of the first and third as heretofore.

Adjourned to meet on the first Tuesday in February next. SUE M. CLUTE, Sec'y.

TAXING CHURCHES.

A petition is in circulation for the abolition by the Legislature of the exemption of churches from taxation. The valuation of meeting-houses in the State of Massachusetts, which are now exempt from taxation, was $22,862,677 in 1870, and is probably now not much less than $25,000,000. If this property were taxed, by the average rate of taxation, it would produce a revenue of from $350,000 to $400,000 a year. Speaking in round numbers, we have a population of 1,500,000, and the meeting-houses will accommodate 900,000. But while the adult population, off from sick beds, might be pretty nearly accommodated with seats in the sanctuary, it is a manifest fact that a great many people, who pay taxes and are in their right minds before the law, exercise the sovereign right of not choosing to be so accommodated. Nevertheless, they have to submit to an annual subsidy from the State to the churches of nearly $400,000. Again, people who prefer to go to church are not all served alike by the State. The occupant of a pew in the modest Adventist chapel is mulcted for all the splendors of the Church of the Unity or of the Memorial, without redress.

We admit all that can be said in favor of the churches. We admit that public peace, society, and civilization depend on their maintenance. But we have discovered in America that the vitality of Christianity is best fostered by making its burdens purely voluntary, and we have adopted the fundamental principle of relieving the State entirely from the care and cost of religious affairs. We do not doubt that the churches are annually worth to the State, in a purely economical sense, vastly more than the taxes amount to, from which they are exempted. But it is nevertheless true that the burden of supporting them does not fall where it ought to, in the republican theory of government, and does not harmonize with our other practices. Every argument which can be brought to the support of the exemption of churches from taxation equally justifies the erection and maintenance of all the meeting-houses at the public expense, and the complete union of Church and State.

Of course, as far as the money goes, the loss of the annual subsidy to a special interest in the Commonwealth will not be entirely made up to that special interest when the same subsidy is divided among the whole population. If it were otherwise, there would be no injustice to rectify. We do not disguise the fact that pew-tenants will have to pay more in the church-tax than they will get back in the remission of taxation on their own property. And the more costly and splendid the church, the greater will be the disproportion. The repeal, therefore, favors the people at large as against the churches, and the poorer churches as against the richer. But the appeal to strict justice should make no Christian man doubtful as to his duty to surrender the tax upon his pew and take his place with his fellow-men in bearing the just burdens of the Commonwealth.—Springfield Republican.

GREAT TAXATION AND NO EXEMPTION.

"The Liberal League of Boston" have taken to "tract distributing." Very many of the voters in Massachusetts besides ourselves have found recently in their post-office boxes a little tract with the above title, and some specious sophistry in support of it, which perhaps demands a passing notice. Some plausible reasons are given for subjecting all church and educational property to taxation; but at least two considerations of great moment are entirely omitted.

1. That all this property is used for no pecuniary benefit to the owners. They instance Tremont Temple, portions of which are used for secular purposes, giving pecuniary returns. Certainly, so far as it is secular, let it be taxed; but according to their own showing, such is now the fact, for when the attention of the assessors was called to this case, a portion of its value corresponding to its pecuniary uses was assessed. So it may and should be in all cases. But property which makes no claim or effort at pecuniary returns may certainly, with justice, be exempted from taxation.

2. A much stronger claim to exemption is in the fact, that this property is contributing, in other ways, a hundred fold more to the protection and welfare of the community than the regular taxation. For instance: the humane societies in New York, with chapels and other buildings, worth a million or two, have searched out and gathered from the slums of the city 100,000 wretched, vagrant children, who were or would have become thieves, drunkards, and harlots, lifted them up, and sent them out to respectable homes in the country, saving the city from the cost of supporting that great army in their criminal institutions, and enduring all the annoyance of their crimes. And yet this "League" would tax those chapels and vagrant homes. That is about like taxing the physician for entering your house to save the life of your child. So all church and educational property is used to maintain the great fundamental principles of society. There is not a meeting-house or a school-room which is not used to give such lessons as "Be honest," "Be sober," "Work with your own hands," "Steal no more," "Love one another," "Bear one another's burdens," and so is saving to the community a hundred fold more than would be received by taxation. If the "League" wish for society free from these exemptions and their fruits, they can find it in the Fiji Islands, or among the Mukwanagoes of Africa.—Boston Daily News, of Jan. 12.

"PUNCH" ON THE POTENTATES.

PIUS TO WILLIAM.

Your Majesty should be aware,
For 'tis a terrible affair,
That Bismarck and his atheist crew
Are making quite a tool of you,
And struggling hard, by force of tricks,
To extirpate your Catholics.
Sire, really you must mind your eye,
Or down your throne comes, by-and-by.
I speak the truth to great and small,
Heretics, Catholics, and all;
For all who've been baptized, you see,
Belong, or more or less, to me.
You'll come to grief, judicio meo,
So, bless you much, dear William.

PIO.

VATICAN, August 7.

WILLIAM TO PIUS.

Your Holiness must have been drugged,
Or, say the least of it, humbugged.
No minister of mine can go
A step ahead, if I say no.
But, Holiness, your blessed priests,
Joining with Communistic beasts,
Have lit fierce fire, and wildly fanned it;
And dash my buttons if I stand it!
How Christian clergymen can dare
Such things, I neither know nor care;
But since they choose to put me to it,
I'm to keep order—and I'll do it.
The best course you can take's to frown,
And bid your priests to knuckle down.
As for belonging to a Pope,
I'm duly grateful for soft soap,
But only know one Mediator
Between myself and my Creator.
But, notwithstanding credo, still I am,
Your peaceful and devoted

WILLIAM.

BERLIN, September 3.

DR. CARPENTER seems likely to become the next bogey of the theological world.

The family of Carpenters is well known as belonging to the most conservative branch of the Unitarian denomination, in which two of them are preachers of the old-fashioned sort. He himself has long been supposed to hold the doctrines of that sect in their most moderate and innocent form, and it was, no doubt, on that account that the clergyman of Sion College recently invited him to read a paper before them.

I may premise that Sion College is an Anglican and religious institution, wherein the bishops and clergy of London periodically assemble, listen to a paper or lecture, and then discuss the same. There were, on this last occasion, about one hundred and fifty of the most eminent prelates and clergymen present, and also a sprinkling of scientific men—among them Tyndall, who is very often, like a certain personage in the Book of Job, present when the holy ones come together.

Dr. Carpenter took for his theme the "Reign of Law," and his treatment of it gave rise to a sensation—I may almost say a scene of nearly a fearful character! It has been hushed up here; no paper would dare to face the ecclesiastical scandal which would be caused by its publication. Dr. Carpenter cast utterly aside the Duke of Argyll's accommodation of the Reign of Law to theological exigencies, and maintained that Nature represented a kingdom of orderly evolution, which had never been invaded by anything arbitrary, preternatural, or supernatural; and his address ended by the emphatic declaration that all liturgies, litanies, collects and prayers that were ever uttered never had influenced—never could influence—the course of this universe, nor mankind, nor a single individual in the slightest degree.

There was a terrible silence when the Doctor sat down. Presently there arose an eminent London clergyman, who said that if he believed the declaration just made, he would ascend his pulpit to announce that the church would be forever closed from that hour. Then he sat down and another painful silence occurred. All eyes were turned upon the tall, thin Doctor, with his intellectual face, to see what effect the remark would have on him. It had none; he belongs to the school of thinkers whose motto is, "Truth, whatever the consequences." Then one after another the clergymen rose, and there was a hurricane of stormy protests. The amount of them was, "This cannot be true, for it would close our prayer books." Carpenter seemed to be unmoved even by this argument. But when the rest of the company had exhausted themselves, Prof. Tyndall arose, and with a slow and solemn voice said:—

"I am speaking to men of education and men of learning; to men who have read history and observed the course of Nature; and I feel constrained to ask you, as gentlemen of culture, whether it is really possible that you can have any belief in the efficacy of prayer to affect this universe in the slightest degree?"

This in Sion College! This to one hundred and fifty clergymen who read prayers every day! Only one seemed to retain enough self-possession to falter out a motion for adjournment, which was adopted in mournful silence.—London Correspondence of Cincinnati Commercial.

Poetry.

"LET US ALL BE UNHAPPY ON SUNDAY."

A LYRIC FOR SATURDAY NIGHT.

Air:—"We bipeds, made up of frail clay."

We zealots, made up of stiff clay,
The sour-looking children of sorrow,
While not over-jolly to-day,
Resolve to be wretched to-morrow.
We can't for a certainty tell
What mirth may molest us on Monday;
But, at least, to begin the week well,
Let us all be unhappy on Sunday.

That day, the calm season of rest,
Shall come to us freezing and frigid;
A gloom all our thoughts shall invest,
Such as Calvin would call over-rigid.
With sermons from morning till night,
We'll strive to be decent and dreary;
To preachers a praise and delight,
Who ne'er think that sermons can weary.

All tradesmen cry up their own wares;
In this they agree well together;
The mason by stone and lime swears;
The tanner is always for leather;
The smith still for iron would go;
The schoolmaster stands up for teaching;
And the parson would have you to know
There's nothing on earth like his preaching.

The face of kind Nature is fair;
But our system obscures its effulgence:
How sweet is a breath of fresh air!
But our rules don't allow the indulgence.
These gardens, their walks and green bowers,
Might be free to the poor man for one day;
But no, the glad plants and gay flowers
Mustn't bloom or smell sweetly on Sunday.

What though a good precept we strain
Till hateful and hurtful we make it!
What though, in thus pulling the rein,
We may draw it so tight as to break it!
Abroad we forbid folks to roam,
For fear they get social or frisky;
But of course they can sit still at home,
And get dismally drunk upon whiskey.

Then, though we can't certainly tell
How mirth may molest us on Monday;
At least, to begin the week well,
Let us all be unhappy on Sunday.

GLIMPSES.

Mr. Potter's sermon in this week's Index will be read with great interest. Next week we shall publish a sermon by Dr. Bartol, prompted by the same occurrence.

Henry C. Bowen requests us to deny the report that the Independent has been sold. As we know nothing of the matter, we can simply give place to his own denial.

The total number of names appended to the "Massachusetts Petition" for the abolition of church-exemption from taxation, and returned to this Office, was 1,134 on Saturday last. The number appended to the "Congressional Petition" for the same measure was 1,210.

Referring to the great Index petition of 35,000 names presented by Mr. Sumner in the Senate, the Savannah (Georgia) Advertiser says: "We take pride in the fact that the South rests undisturbed by such folly. The date of the Constitution recognizes 'our Lord,' and there is no need for this agitation. But people at the North so love excitement and notoriety that it is a Godsend for them."

Signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition" have been received at this Office since last week as follows: from Mr. W. C. Rust, Manchester, Mass., 71 names; from Mr. William H. Fobes, Boston, 59; from Mr. H. Chapman, Dennis, 33; from Miss J. P. Titcomb, Boston, 12; from Mr. P. M. Wheeler, Boston, 14; from Mr. Guilford White, Easton, 16; from Mr. S. R. Koehler, Boston Highlands, 22; from Mr. Eben Snow, Cambridge, 104.

The "Congressional Petition" for equitable taxation of church property has received the following lists of signatures since our last issue: from Mrs. F. A. Jordan, Battle Creek, Mich., 118 names; from Mr. Eben Snow, Cambridge, Mass., 95; from Mr. William H. Fobes, Boston, 62; from Mr. H. Chapman, Dennis, Mass., 34; from Mr. S. R. Koehler, Boston Highlands, 22; from Mr. P. M. Wheeler, Boston, 14; from Mr. L. H. Beal, Lisbon Falls, Me., 86.

The incidental remark we made last week that the custom of Annual State Election Sermons had been discontinued for several years in Massachusetts, but resumed this year, seems to be a mistake, although we made it on the authority of the Boston Globe. It is now said that there has been no hiatus in the series of sermons, and that the only change consisted in holding the services last year at the State House instead of at a church. So much for trusting to "authority"!

From the Minneapolis (Minnesota) Daily Tribune, of Jan. 13, we clip this paragraph: "Messrs. L. K. Washburn, R. E. Grimshaw, and John Vander Horck are a committee to take the initiative steps necessary to the formation of a political league, the purpose of which is to secure equitable taxation of all property excepting that held by the State or communities for school purposes. In other words, the organization proposes to use every honorable effort to secure the taxation of all property now held by churches and religious societies and corporations of every character, banded together and working for a particular purpose. The main effort of the League for the present will be directed towards securing the taxation of church property, and all who are favorable to this object will be invited to coöperate with it."

Says the Independent: "A student in one of the theological seminaries in this city, on hearing the name of Theodore Parker mentioned, inquired whether he was the Parker who spoke at the meeting of the Alliance the other day. The story will not be believed; but it is true." This incredible ignorance does not surprise us. It illustrates the general destitution of information respecting the real facts and ideas of radicalism which strikes every well-informed person as characteristic of Orthodoxy, even as represented by its ministers and its journals. Orthodox writers, so far as our observation goes, almost never comprehend what they so stoutly oppose; and the chief labor of radicals, in their discussions with them, is to correct the innumerable and wild misstatements they fall into. It would be refreshing now and then to discuss actual issues on their real merits.

It should be said, in reference to Mr. Voysey's "London Letter" of this week, that the word "Sabbath" properly means a sacred or holy day in an exceptional sense, the supposed sanctity of it being grounded on the Hebrew Decalogue; and that this is the sense given to it in the "Demands of Liberalism." No demand is there made for the abolition of any "day of rest" which may be instituted by the people as a beneficial social custom or regulation. What liberals must protest against is all legislation based on the notion that Sunday is holier than other days, or that its observance as a religious day is to be enforced in any degree by law. The question of maintaining a public rest-day is not raised in the "Demands of Liberalism." Personally, we agree with Mr. Voysey in thinking that such a rest-day is indispensable to mankind; though we are not quite settled in opinion how far it should be sustained by legal enactment. If a man does not want to rest, we certainly would not interfere with his liberty to work or to play.

The Boston Daily News, in an article copied in another column, argues that church-property should not be taxed because it is of "no pecuniary benefit to the owners." The same reasoning would exempt the estates of amateur farmers, who usually enjoy the luxury of fancy agriculture at a heavy expense. But the plea is not satisfactory, while so many business and professional men join the church avowedly for the purpose of securing the profits of increased custom among the "faithful." Another and "much stronger" reason urged by the News is the alleged fact that churches contribute indirectly to the general weal a "hundred-fold more" than their taxes would amount to. But on this jovial principle there would be no taxes. Does not every large factory contribute more to social prosperity by the numerous hands it employs, and the increased business they bring to a town, than the amount of its taxes? Where the laws permit it, do not towns often tax themselves to give a bonus for the establishment of new mills and manufactories within their own limits? Does not the erection of fine buildings, and all improvements of real estate, raise the value of all contiguous property? Does not every addition to the capital of a city or town promote its prosperity? Let us all go untaxed on the score of our general value to the community! Such cheerful doctrine as the News inculcates would exempt everything and everybody. Very well: let us all be exempt, or all pay our equitable share towards defraying the expenses of the protection we enjoy.

Opposition to the taxation of church property begins to take definite form and expression. We commend the following to the penitent reflections of the Independent, which some time back accused us of "Jesuitism" for praising a particular Baptist minister who advocated this reform, when, forsooth, the whole Christian community was burning with disinterested zeal to be taxed! Why have not all churches, then, been taxed from the beginning? Who exempted them? Were the "infidels" so willing to support Christianity at their own expense as to force the reluctant churches to accept the charity? Did they insist on being allowed the honor of stepping into the horses' harness, and dragging the blushing churches in a barouche? What nonsense! We assert that church-exemption obtains because the churches themselves exacted and still exact this tribute, according to their traditional policy of "spoiling the Egyptians" in every possible way; and we challenge the Independent to show any other reason for it. But this is the paragraph we refer to, clipped from a Boston paper:—

"An amendment being proposed to the Constitution of New Jersey whereby all church property will become liable to taxation, the Baptists of the State have put in circulation a petition against it, on the several grounds: First, that church edifices are erected by voluntary contributions for religious purposes, and, yielding no income, a tax in the case would be a repressive taxation of benevolence; second, the exemption is not unjust because churches enhance the value of property in a community, increase the public revenues, and promote good morals; third, the nation being in a general sense a Christian one, it should not burden the offerings of Christian benevolence; fourth, the purity and perpetuity of our republican form of government depend upon the virtue and morals of the people, and 'to embarrass the efforts of Christians to promote the cause of religion and of Christian education, by compelling them to pay taxes on the moneys contributed for those purposes, would be to strike a heavy blow at the only possible safeguard of free institutions.'"

SCIENCE AND—SCIENCE.

How petty and narrow is the thought which most men have of science! It stands as a convenient term under which to huddle together a confused mass of observations and technicalities and unintelligible formulæ,—a disorderly heap of facts, theories, discoveries, calculations, classifications, generalizations,—a rudis indigestaque moles in whose chaotic waste it never occurs to them to suspect lie the unmarshalled elements of a cosmos yet to be. To some of them science is a wild and terrible beast, threatening to burst out of the cage in which religion has imprisoned it, and to eat them all alive; to others it is the "big brother round the corner" who is suddenly to appear and thrash the bullying "priestcraft" they are unable to manage single-handed; to others still it seems to be a new Mother Goose, whose sole business it is to flourish her broomstick and "sweep the cobwebs from the sky." In one way and another, men cherish the most grotesque and ludicrous conceptions of what science and its functions are. All parties are ambitious to hitch her to the wagon of their own conceit, and so drive Pegasus to market. But Pegasus was not born to haul potatoes or give fools a ride.

To the few who are fitted by nature or education to comprehend the new era upon which the world is now entering, science is the wonderful mind of man aspiring to know the whole truth of things, and following the clew of its own inherent law in the universal interpretation of all that is. On the one hand, it cannot be impressed into the service of any interests, whether of individuals or parties; it cannot be degraded into cherishing any concern for consequences; it cannot be swerved from its one pure purpose of discovering what is real in a maze of semblances. On the other hand, it cannot be seduced into allegiance to any law but that of thought; it cannot be beguiled into submission to any authority but that of reason; it cannot be harnessed into the traces of any creed, prejudice, or preconception. In a word, science is simply pursuit of the truth in the spirit of truth; and her sphere includes everything of which it can be asked—"Is it true or false?"

One caution here. Do not confound science itself with the set of opinions held at any particular time by any particular set of scientific men. A century or two ago, Copernicus, Tycho Brahe, Kepler, Galileo, Newton, and others, represented science to the world; but their teachings were not science, except so far as they have been found to be absolutely true. Their errors were their own; their discoveries were mankind's for all time. So also to-day. The great scientific lights of this age represent science, undoubtedly; but the future will sift out their errors from their truths, retaining the latter only as science indeed. This plain distinction, so elementary when stated, is habitually overlooked; and it exposes the foolishness of much fashionable twaddle on the subject. To talk of "authority in science" and "authority in religion" in the same, or even in a similar, sense, nauseates every mind which can distinguish between "a hawk and a hand-saw."

It is true enough that the "tendency of science in the present day," if confounded with the tendency of many distinguished men of science whose star is now in the zenith, is in the direction of materialism. This is natural enough, nay, necessary, so long as the chief attention of science is given to the physical sciences; and it must be so given, until these are far more thoroughly matured than they are to-day. But what will be the "tendency of science" when sociology, psychology, ethics, and metaphysics (by which we mean simply the science of the abstract relations and conditions of all being) shall have proportionally developed, it is the sheerest presumption to dogmatize about. We believe its tendency will be, not in a materialistic, but in a monistic direction; and this belief is based on no intentional or emotional reasons, but rather on reasons which (rightly or wrongly) we have drawn from the very nature of science itself. The science which is to bring out luminously the unity of Nature cannot, in our opinion, be one-sided or partial in the treatment of facts which are too recondite, too far removed from the field of her attained discoveries, to be brought as yet fairly within reach of her methods. But science is not yet in her teens; her career is scarcely begun; and he who pronounces over-confidently on her future development evinces the profundity of his own ignorance. Enough for us that the old deductive method of starting from God to explain the universe, instead of reverently interrogating the universe to learn what it has to teach about God, is passing away with the scholastic theology it gave birth to; and while others are trembling at the approach of science, as if it were an audacious

Phaethon burning up the world with the rays of a knowledge too intense, we hail it as the Apollo whose chariot shall give light, warmth, and glory to the future of our race.

THEORY AND PRACTICE IN THE WOMAN MOVEMENT.

"A. W. S." closes a notice of Miss Jennie Collins and her "Boffin's Bower" with these words: "They are evidently doing a greater service in securing woman's right to labor, and to have a career, than any more theoretical enterprise looking to the same end."

This stricture on those who are laboring, in perfect harmony with all judicious practical movements, to diffuse ideas in regard to woman's employment, seems quite out of place in a journal which lays such stress on the importance of disseminating intellectual truth as THE INDEX. "A. W. S." seems to have contempt for theory only when it relates to women.

All the false difficulties in adjusting woman's relation to labor (I say false because I acknowledge that there are also real ones) grow out of the prevalent idea that it is unbecoming a woman to support herself or work for money, and that she forfeits the title of "lady" in doing so. However much Miss Collins or any other person may do towards securing work for individuals, is it not a help to them to destroy this false theory, and must not all successful enterprises be built on true theories? E. D. C.

[I feel quite sure that Mr. Stevens intended no disparagement to the labors of those who are toiling to disseminate true theories on the "woman movement," but only wished to emphasize the importance of practical exertions to carry them out. He is not one to undervalue the thinker's work in any degree, and would greatly regret, I am confident, any misunderstanding of his real purpose in the sentence quoted, which, like all such brief "Notes," simply touched one aspect of the subject. In his absence, Mrs. Cheney and he will excuse me for speaking for him, I hope; for THE INDEX ought to have, and does have, equal sympathy for true theory and faithful work.—F. E. A.]

MANLINESS.

The importance of the work which Free Religion aims to accomplish is perpetually suggested, and in aspects little thought of. The sectarian spirit, whether on a large scale or on a small, as belonging to the professors of a religion like the Christian, or to the members of an insignificant sect, creates a public opinion so strong as fairly to override individual character, and dictate terms to conscience. The average man is not supposed able to rise above it, is held excusable in meannesses that would be sharply rebuked if tried by rules of ordinary morality, and is commended for qualities that a self-respecting soul blushes to hear praised. As the politician contents himself with the virtue which satisfies the party, counting everything beyond it to be grandeur, even though decency would be too high a name for it, so the sectarian, denominationalist, disciple, churchman, reckons his narrow fidelity to be righteousness, and plumes himself on his scrimp goodness, though to candid eyes it look as little like goodness as a tallow dip looks like a star. The subject suggests a long sermon; it is not our purpose to write even a short one. The thought comes up in connection with one or two mortifying instances of eulogy on conduct so exceedingly common-place as to merit not even the faintest commendation.

A religious paper of the West, rigorously orthodox, prints an insulting misstatement about an unorthodox preacher, prints it without asking whether it be true or no, without expressing misgiving in regard to its correctness, or a hope that it may be incorrect,—infers the truth of it from certain loose words in a paper notorious for the unscrupulous manner in which it deals with opinions and characters. The editor, no doubt, felt perfectly justified in inserting the paragraph; his sectarian conscience not only administered no rebuke for the slander, but, more likely, vigorously applauded the deed, as done in the cause of Christ. On being gently reminded of his fault, and courteously put in the way of seeing it in its true light, he pens half a dozen words of regret for the paragraph, disclaims all personal responsibility for it, taking to himself no blame, and puts into his retraction the smallest possible amount of feeling; which would seem to imply that he was not a person of sensitive honor. Yet so fixed is the sectarian standard of morality, so narrow the denominational conscience, so base the editorial ethics, bad enough in the secular press, but far worse in the "religious," that this grudging admission of error, this meagre acknowledgment of fallibility, this reluctant disavowal of a statement made, is characterized as a frank, manly, high-minded confession, altogether worthy of an honorable man; an instance of magnanimity too seldom practised, and warmly recommended to the editorial fraternity! Outside of the sect, no clear mind would hesitate to say that manliness required a good deal more, that manliness was scarcely interested at all in what was actually done. Unless Free Religion falls very far short of its humblest professions, it will set a standard of manliness, editorial and otherwise, that will reflect a scorching rebuke on conduct at first so disreputable, at last so half-hearted.

Another example: a gentleman is praised for his manliness in withdrawing openly from an association to which he feels that he does not belong; where he has no place, or duty; from which he derives nothing and to which he gives nothing; by which he, to his own thought, is made to stand in false relations before the community. Neither his staying nor his withdrawing can be supposed to concern vitally either himself or others. Where, then, was the manliness of his course? It was taken simply because, to him, it was sincere. But is sincerity, in a Christian community, so unusual a quality that the most humdrum exhibition of it is enough to make a man a hero? Manliness is assertion of manhood in face of inducements to betray it. Where were the inducements? Was it cowardice that moved his friend "W. J. P." to decline to relieve the same Association of his presence? Perhaps it required more courage to remain than to depart. Does one sacrifice so much in leaving a sect, or gain so much by staying in it? It seems to be thought so. When false relations are habitual, true ones are exceptional, and the exceptional is associated with the independent, the brave, the magnanimous. Such a state of things is mortifying; but it is not likely to cease, so long as humanity is identified with cliques. O. B. F.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I hope it will not be misunderstood to imply a division in our camp, if I make a few independent remarks on the seventh clause of "The Demands of Liberalism."

"We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed."

Now there are two words in this clause which need definition, "observance" and "Sabbath." By the term Sabbath, I understand a day of rest from ordinary labors—manufacture, commerce and toil incidental thereto. By the term "observance," I understand in this clause a regular and more or less strict abstinence from ordinary labor on the Sunday. This and no more. Abstinence from labor, but not abstinence from play and pleasure.

I write in ignorance of the Sabbath laws which are in force in America; for aught I know they may be as moderate and elastic as they are in London, or as severe and rigid as they are in Edinburgh. But this need not prevent my speaking in general terms of the principle which seems to me the one we should adopt in reference to legislation on the subject. Let me say at once that I am no "Sabbatarian," in the accepted sense of that term. I do not regard the institution of the "day of rest" as in any sense divine, or as more than a provision made by the good sense and kind-heartedness of man for the benefit of his race.

Short of annoying my neighbors by reckless disregard of their religious feelings, there is nothing which I do on the week-day which I would not do likewise on the Sunday. For example, I do not dig in my garden on Sunday, though I should enjoy doing so, because I think my neighbors would be distressed by it; but I read my newspaper, enjoy operatic music, and play my game at cards with extra relish, because these things give me rest.

My children, from infancy, have had carte blanche to amuse themselves, and their best toys were always kept for Sunday; only the rule is in summer time, when they play in the garden, they must not be so loud and boisterous for fear of disturbing their neighbors' repose or devotions.

Then as to Sunday trading,—I fear I am a great heretic in that also. I am indignant at the raids made by the "unco guid" against poor costermongers and petty shop-keepers, whose only or chief means of livelihood is their Sunday trade in various small goods which are easy of traffic.

Years ago, I went on Sunday evening to a newspaper shop to buy a Bradshaw on a pressing emergency. I respectfully asked the good woman who served me why they kept the shop open on Sundays. She replied, "We hardly take a shilling all the week, but on Sundays we earn quite enough to live; and me and my husband havin' a family, we can't get on without it." She was much delighted when she heard from my clerical lips that I thought they were quite right, and that, even if the clergy were angry, God in heaven wouldn't blame them one bit.

I have thought it necessary to preface my remarks thus, that your readers may know what manner of man it is who ventures to defend the existence of Sabbath laws in the columns of THE INDEX.

I do not treat it as a religious question at all; I only treat it as a social one.

My opinion is that some kind of Fourth Commandment is quite as necessary now as in the days to which Jewish tradition assigns its origin. It was a clever saying of Punch that "a tyrant is only a slave turned inside out;" and if the story of Israel's servitude in Egypt be true, depend upon it, the freed Israelites were all too ready to become tyrants, and to pursue the passion for gain common to humanity.

But I much doubt whether Israel, in his worst days of hunger and thirst after "filthy lucre," could be worse than many Gentiles in England and in America. The love for money manifests itself by signs too indecent to be ignored, and there can be no doubt that the abolition of Sabbath laws would be immediately followed by the enforcement of perpetual labor. All persons in a position of dependence would be at the mercy of covetous employers, and in most cases they would lose the one day's rest which is now secured to them by law.

Rather than such a calamity should fall on the defenceless, I would forego my own personal liberty as regards the Sunday, and would deliberately prefer the odious restrictions of the Scotch Sabbath.

And this brings me to say that, instead of having fewer legal holidays, we sadly want more. Our days of rest, alas! are sadly too few,—our days of toil too many and cruelly too long. New diseases and derangements of stomach, nerve, and brain are springing up out of this turbid life of anxiety and excessive toil, and what posterity will say to us when they find how we have quickened their pace, I leave our guilty consciences to foretell.

We want more Sundays, and not fewer; we want also still greater interference with corporations on the part of our Governments, and not for them to wash their hands of the cause of the poor, and say, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

Leave railway boards to themselves, and the first thing they do is to rob their servants of twenty-six Sundays in the year—half their wonted rest! I would have laws by which such robbery would be made impossible. No contract should be permitted which did not provide at least one day in seven for the repose and recreation of the laborer.

I write in some bitterness, because week after week, month after month, I never know what it is to rest for a whole day. I get my sleep at night, and snatch half hours of comparative leisure and stillness through each day, as I can and when I can. But this is not like a real and regular holiday, which makes a new man of one and enables one to work without despair, because you know you are working up to a break, and the strain will soon cease.

If an act of Parliament would make it a misdemeanor for me to miss my weekly rest, to go on as I do the year round, I would bless the "paternal Government" that would thus restrict my liberty to commit lingering suicide. I am very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E., Dec. 31, 1873.

P. S.—I hope it is clearly understood that it is quite immaterial on what day of the week rest is to be insured, so long as each person gets at least one day in seven. For general purposes the appointment of the same day for the large majority is an obvious convenience.

A GREAT CHURCH-GRAB.

The Old South Church, of Boston, is supposed to be worth half a million of dollars, having a large amount of real estate very valuable for business purposes. When the great Boston fire occurred more than a year ago, the United States Government, through Postmaster Burt, declared that the Old South Church was "the only place they can go to" for a Post-office. The proprietors, who had been enjoying an income of $44,000 a year, petitioned the Massachusetts Legislature for leave to lease the church to the Government for $46,000 a year for two years. This request, despite loud protests from many quarters, was granted, and the old building is now occupied by the Post-office. The proprietors now petition the Legislature for leave to sell the church for what it will bring.

Now what is the real justice of this demand? Mr. J. P. Quincy, in Old and New, well exposes its true nature. A great many years ago, the land now occupied by the Old South Church was donated by Madame Norton for use as the site of a house of religious worship. For this reason alone the property has been exempted from all taxation; and by the general growth of the city it is now worth many times its original value. Even if it were just to exempt from all taxation the original value of the land, what right have the proprietors to claim, for their own purposes, tax-exemption for the vast increase of this value? Mr. Quincy proposes that all the taxes from the beginning, principal and interest, on this increased value, should be paid over to the State, before the proprietors should be allowed to get off with the residue. Why not? The increase of value results from the business growth of the city at large, for which taxes have been paid by those who secured it, while the Old South Church has paid nothing on its own rapidly-growing property, but has made the rest of the community pay everything in its own stead. Even if this were justifiable so long as the property was used for the purposes for which it was originally donated, it is plainly unjustifiable, now that the persons who happen at present to be "proprietors" of the church propose to sell it for their own advantage. They ought not to be allowed to go off with the plunder of the community, but rather should be obliged to disgorge it for the public benefit. The church-grab is no better in principle than the salary-grab. The latter has been rebuked and in a measure rectified by an indignant people; the former ought to have the same sentence pronounced upon it. Have the people sufficient intelligence and determination to insist on their own rights in the matter, or are they so inured to being fleeced by the Church that they are unable to apply a familiar principle to the new case? We hope that justice will not only be discerned by the few, but done by the many.

Literary Notices.

THE OLD FAITH AND THE NEW: A Confession by David Friedrich Strauss. New York: Henry Holt & Co. 1873.

This latest work of the celebrated author of the Life of Jesus is calculated to excite, and has excited, great opposition in Europe. We have not, however, yet seen any proper review of it in this country, and do not now intend to attempt one; but merely to indicate one or two of the ideas contained in it, and the impression produced thereby.

The first three chapters occupy the chief part of the book, and are written to answer his own questions which head them respectively, namely: "Are we still Christians?" "Have we a religion?" "What is our conception of the universe?"

He states that in using the word "we," he means to cover those who agree with him.

It is not intended, as was said above, to give a full criticism of his treatment and solution of these questions; but it may be stated that he touches and dissolves, one after another, the beliefs in Christ, God, and Immortality. In so doing, he frequently refers to and quotes Kant, Schopenhauer (whose morose pessimism seems very distasteful to him), Hegel, and other German writers, and also Darwin, whose ideas he explains at some length. From all of these he draws evidence against spirituality or dualism, as he calls Christianity, and in favor of materialism, or a view of the universe or cosmos as self-existent.

We are disposed to agree with much that he says about Christianity and its want of a reasonable foundation, or even of a raison d'être, though it would seem that more credit might be accorded to the sentiment of love, as taught by Jesus and some of his followers, and its effect on the civilization of Christendom.

We venture to ask, however, whether anything is gained by eliminating God and Immortality. It seems, perhaps, more logical to adhere closely to our positive knowledge, so to speak, and, as we can be cognizant only of phenomena and matter, to say that matter is the cause and end of everything, and call the universe the Great All. Is it not, however, just as easy to conceive of a self-existent God, manifesting himself in creation, as of self-existent or ever-existent matter endowed with properties which result in the universe? After all, is it not as much an affair of language or words as anything else? Dr. Strauss does not, so far as we can see, attempt to account for his existent matter; others do attempt to account for it by a preëxistent God, who, so far as we are concerned, manifests himself, or is known to us, through matter. To the latter, therefore, the words "God" and "Matter" are almost synonymous, while Strauss prefers to use only one of them.

He says at the end of his volume that, if one is not satisfied with his part in the universe here and now, and content to be virtuous for the sake of virtue and right, he cannot explain his ideas to such an one, and that consolation must still be sought from the old, existing systems of belief.

It is natural that we should be reluctant to give up our belief in immortality, for to most of us, whether owing to education or feebleness of character, this world appears altogether too confined, and our lives too short, for the proper consummation of our desires and destiny, and also far too unequal, in its division of what are considered rewards and punishments, or prizes and blanks.

May it not be possible, even granting our author's reasoning in regard to the improbability of a creative God, that our existence as conscious entities continues indefinitely after what we call death here?

He argues that we have no proof of the existence of a soul or spirit apart from the functions of the brain, which constitute the mind; that, if the brain is injured, the spiritual part of us suffers; and hence that what is called mind, soul, spirit, is a product of the brain, which is matter, and therefore, when the material part dies, there is no evidence that any thing continues. This may be so; but if the theory of the conservation of force is true (and it is the explanation of his view of the universe), causing a constant movement and change throughout the whole, and resulting in the ultimate destruction of the part of it that we now see and know, and its reconstruction in some form, why may not the force represented by the change of brain-matter into thought, or mind, remain in that or some analogous form or condition in the universe for an indefinite time, gradually developing and improving, or, as Christians express it, perfecting itself, until in the great future the universe, the cosmos, shall be chiefly or wholly represented by what we now call spirit, soul, or mind,—a something impalpable to us now, but then, perhaps, as real to us as is matter in our present condition?

May not this, perhaps, be a part of the idea contained in the Buddhist doctrine of Nirvana, which, Max Müller maintains, means absorption into Buddha or Deity, that is, annihilation; while Samuel Johnson, in his Oriental Religions, endeavors to show on the contrary that it means immortality, in which opinion he is sustained by the author of The Modern Buddhist?

But we prefer to retain God also, looking upon the universe as his emanation and manifestation of himself; and we should still conceive the individual spirits or souls as destined, after their appearance here in the highest earthly development of which matter is capable, to pass into what is called the other world,—that is, some other phase or portion of the cosmos,—and there continue the process of evolution, that is, God; and, God being infinite and we finite, that process of evolution and perfection must be indefinite or infinite in duration, making us immortal.

The fourth and last chapter of the book, entitled, "How do we order our lives?" is largely occupied with the author's views of politics and political economy; in which his aristocratic feelings and tendencies, although he proclaims himself a simple middle-class citizen, seem to bias his judgment, and make him appear unjust to the democratic aspirations of the so-called working classes, as his strong German nationality prejudices him against the French, and both tend rather to lower him from the philosophic heights which he so naturally occupies in the earlier chapters.

In an appendix, we get his ideas upon poetry and music, in a loving and appreciative criticism or review of the chief works of Lessing, Goethe, and Schiller; and of Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. The beautiful dramatic poem by Lessing, Nathan the Wise, he regards as holding much the same place in relation to the belief of himself (Strauss) and his followers that the Scriptures do to Christian, Buddhist, and Mohammedan believers; and, although he holds that the three poets, as well as the last three of the musicians named above, are very nearly on a par one with another, yet he seems to have a special fondness for Lessing in the one case, and Mozart in the other, as more abounding in beauty and loveliness.

The general tone of the book, excepting the appendix, we found rather oppressive, as it left the impression that the author considers it a matter of considerable indifference whether one holds any belief or not; while we cannot but think that man requires a belief in something, the dreariness of absolute scepticism being so depressing as to unfit him for properly exerting himself toward the fulfilment of his duties and destiny.

J. A. H.

WHILE THE States of the Union have been remiss in their systems of prison discipline, the warden of the Utah penitentiary has adopted methods of classifying and treating prisoners which are highly creditable to his intelligence and humanity. He divides the convicts into three classes—first, old offenders; second, those who have committed crimes while intoxicated or under the influence of sudden passion; third, youths who are not yet hardened. While the first are regarded as almost hopeless, they are treated with all the kindness that is possible with a due consideration of their case. The second and third classes are, however, the object of the warden's especial philanthropy. He is authorized to hire the prisoners out to contractors, and extends this practice to the second class when they show signs of reform, while the young prisoners are placed, as far as possible, with persons who feel a genuine desire to do them good. The fruits of this system have been highly gratifying; only four per cent. of the prisoners have proved utterly unworthy of confidence, the remainder turning out well. Although nothing definite is known of the other forty-eight per cent., yet enough has been proved to render the method of the Utah warden worthy of attention by all interested in the important subject of prison discipline.—Boston Globe.

FAITH—KNOWLEDGE.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

In your fine but too brief critical notice of Dr. Bartol's new and doubtless very significant book, The Rising Faith (I have not yet, I am sorry to say, reached the reading of it), you make one statement that I am quite unable to understand. You say: "I aver in all earnestness—the proof of the deepest insight in these days is the perception ('intuition,' if you please) that the age of faith has gone, the age of knowledge come," &c.

Do you mean to affirm (I cannot think you do) that knowledge does or can supplant faith,—using the term faith in its broad sense? Without faith, trust, in some things we do not see and cannot experimentally know, I see not how we should ever attain knowledge at all. We must assume the trustworthiness of our faculties, must postulate that they report truly, that impression corresponds to fact, or how should we ever make the passage to objective reality?

But, this aside, does it not remain true that there is always a Transcendent, a Higher and a More, overarching and including as well as pervading and inspiring all that we see; and that knowledge, by no possible stretch of its attainment, can go so far as to take this away?

Within seen is unseen, within form substance, beneath manifestation life, beyond finite infinite. This, I take it, is the realm we lay hold of through faith alone,—a realm, while transcendent, yet very real. To its apprehension the sensuous organs have no adaptedness; we are here beyond the reach of their sounding. On it religion is grounded; in its just interpretation and practical application to ourselves lies all the domain of worship and the exalted thought and life.

Knowledge is indeed to be welcomed, for it has a very important function to perform in the growth and perfection of humanity; and religion may well bid it God-speed in its best endeavors. I have no fear that "adoration" shall die out in its light. Until knowledge shall have gone so far that there shall be no farther, and seen so deeply within that there shall be no inner, adoration will still have its realm which it will hold good against the world.

If you deem otherwise,—deem (as your paragraph seems to indicate) that knowledge is to supersede faith,—will you please explain how the change is to be brought about, and tell us how faith is inevitably to vanish, to fade and die, in the light of the new day?

Yours sincerely, CHAS. D. B. MILLS.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Jan. 12, 1874.

[The notice of Dr. Bartol's book was indeed "too brief,"—far too brief to do its great merit even partial justice; but it should be remembered that a notice is not a review. We greatly regretted, when we came to see it in print, that there seemed to be in it more of criticism than appreciation. Yet our thoughts continually recur to the question of method, which is vastly more important than any question of immediate results, because all future results depend upon it. Whether, in our search after truth, we are to work by the principle of intuitive faith or of scientific reason, is a question of such momentous and overshadowing consequence, that it rises paramount to all minor inquiries in this age. It quite crowded out of our mind the many grateful things we had to say in special acknowledgment of Dr. Bartol's fructifying and fruitful genius. They will come to any thoughtful person, however, who reads his book as it deserves to be read.

Perhaps the dialogue on the "Ground of Theism," in the last INDEX, may have answered by anticipation some of Mr. Mills' queries, but not all. Our confidence in the "trustworthiness of our faculties," which is properly enough called "faith" in them, is not an axiomatic postulate, but the result of our mental experience. We learn to think, as we learn to walk, by timid experiment, and frequent failure,—blunders, tumbles, and bruises. It is verification that gives us confidence or faith, when we have learned at last to command the motions of our own thought, and found that reason is our only guide to truth. At first all thought is tentative, accompanied with little or no confidence in its conclusions; but we learn by and by to trust it. Science or "knowledge" is the verified thought of mankind; and all rational faith is the direct product or outgrowth of this verification. That is, knowledge is the creator of all faith that is not superstition,—all faith in the trustworthiness of our own faculties, all faith in the truths they discover. Faith is the soul's repose in the presence of truth; it is neither eye nor hand, neither faculty of vision nor of apprehension nor of action, but the consciousness of success in the employment of all faculty. We are very far from holding that "knowledge is to supersede faith;" but we do hold that the faith which is not grounded on it is illusory, evanescent, and paralyzing. The "age of faith" that is passing away is the age of ecclesiastical or theological faith; and that is all we meant. Though the "age of knowledge" that is arriving will have its faith too, born of experience, science, reason, mankind are ceasing to have faith in any other Infinite than that which can be known.—ED.]

SHALLOW CRITICISM.

The New York Independent says:—

"A letter to The Tribune from Boston eulogizes the brilliant address of Mr. Frothingham, on Protestantism, at Horticultural Hall, Sunday before last, and concludes thus: 'It was keen, caustic, inexorable; as cold and as glittering as an iceberg.' Whether the description be accurate or not, it is evidently meant to be complimentary; and it moves us to ask whether a product of this character is the supreme result of the 'Religion of Humanity.'"

What shallow criticism is this? Is, then, the Free Religious Association the only organization which is not to avail itself of a variety of gifts and recognize a variety of temperaments among its members? Frothingham is cool, clear, systematic, and finds religion chiefly in the intellect. Higginson is constitutionally warm and sympathetic, and finds religion chiefly in the heart. Samuel Longfellow is poetic, thoughtful, gentle, and finds religion chiefly in spiritual perception. All these are cordially united and have been lifelong fellow-workers. Each works in his own way, and each is a legitimate result of the "Religion of Humanity." COMMON SENSE.

THE DRED SCOTT DECISION AGAIN.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

If Mr. Alfred Conkling, who writes you respecting the Dred Scott decision, knows anything of the subject he is discussing, his misstatements are inexcusable. If he does not, the only fault to be found with him is meddling beyond his depth.

How the decision in that case was in Scott's "favor," as Mr. Conkling affirms, is hard to conceive, since Scott was held to be a slave, denied the right to sue at all and driven out of court.

To say that Taney intended his infamous dictum (that negroes "had no rights which the white man was bound to respect") for the victims of the slave trade only, shows that Mr. Conkling never read the decision. The Chief-Justice applies it to the whole negro race in the United States, and holds that to be the light in which the Constitution of the United States regards them.

The precise, and perhaps the only, point really decided in that case was that the Supreme Court of the United States would go to the Courts of a slave State to find out whether a man was a slave or not. Taney, after the gravest perversions of history, volunteered the atrocious dictum we have quoted above, and strains every nerve to throw the whole weight of the Court on the side of slavery. It was for this subservient ruling, for his gross misstatements of history, and for his manifest effort to make his Court the tool of the slave power, that the abolitionists denounced him. To-day the world indorses their judgment. Mr. Conkling seems to be one of the few Rip Van Winkles who refuse to wake up. P. FISK.

THE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT "DOWN EAST."

UNION, Me., Dec. 10, 1873.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Mr. Joel S. Richards, of Camden, Me., formerly an Advent preacher, gave his first lecture on the Proposed Christian Amendment in this place last Sunday evening. He produced documents to prove that this Amendment was contemplated by Christians as far back as 1835. He gave a brief history of the National Reform Association, and pictured the horrors that would inevitably result, if the demands of this Association should be granted. The attention of the audience was called to the Liberal Party which was organizing throughout the country to counteract the Christian movement.

He read the nine "Demands of Liberalism," and proved that each "Demand" was founded on the principle of justice. In his concluding remarks, he regretted that he had spent the prime of his life in the cause of Christianity, which he now believes to be an error, and proposed to devote the remainder of his days to the glorious cause of religious freedom.

Mr. Richards is an able, impressive speaker, and handles his subject with great skill and ability.

Previous to this lecture, the people in this vicinity were ignorant of the Christian and Liberal movements; but now they are warned of the approaching danger, and, if called upon to decide this question by the ballot, I can assure you that the little town of Union will be found on the side of Truth and Liberty.

By the way, would you like to know what our Orthodox pastor thinks of the Christian Amendment?

I lent him one of the Index Tracts (God in the Constitution), and he returned it with the following note:—

"Never fear that any such changes in our Constitution as those here spoken of will ever be adopted. The Christian people of this country would be as much opposed to such changes as any others; and I am sorry that the writer of this tract does not know Christian people better than he seems to. They were Christian men, mostly, who formed our Constitution and government."

You are at liberty to do as you see fit with this letter. Yours truly,

CHAS. A. MILLER.

A LIBERAL OFFER.

MR. EDITOR:—

Deeply impressed with the importance of the work in which you are engaged, and the urgency of its vigorous prosecution, and believing that for this end the following is true:—

First, that the organized union of all Liberals for coöperative work is the greatest need of the present time:

Second, that this can only be effected upon the universal principles of freedom, justice, truth and brotherhood, which underlie their separate statements of belief:

Third, that these principles are openly violated in the succor and support the State extends to the Church:

Fourth, that the first, most necessary, natural, and logical step to be taken is, therefore, to protest against and resist the unjust allowance of these encroachments:

Fifth, that such agitation, even if it increases for a time the strength of the Church, as it did that of the Slave Power, must eventually lead to its total overthrow, and final dissolution:

Therefore I gratuitously offer my services, by word and tract, to unite all Liberals in severing the roots by which a costly, burdensome, oppressive and monarchical Church has been able to thrive and flourish in the midst of a free and republican State.

Wherever there are a dozen Liberals, with a room eighteen by twenty, let them plant the seeds of a new anti-slavery reform.

"WILL FREE RELIGION HAVE A FUTURE?"

Some one makes this inquiry, and answers, "We think not." Whether free religion has a future under its specific name or not is a matter of very little importance; but whether its underlying principles are enduring is quite another thing. You might as well inquire if water will continue to freeze at a temperature of thirty-two degrees, or fire always consume wood, as to question the future existence, the permanency and universal acceptance of the ideas entertained by the liberals of to-day and promulgated by THE INDEX.

Minds exist in every generation far in advance of the multitude, and the ultra views of these persecuted few become the popular thought of the age succeeding their crucifixion; and yet, while the religious world admits this fact in theory and practice, actually building tangible monuments to the memory of last century's martyred infidels, at the same time they are playing over again the rôle of their predecessors in beating most unmercifully with the broomstick of their theology any and all who are thrusting their heads out of the tortoise-shell of their own ecclesiastical faith.

Were free religion a movement of a few crazy fanatics, anxious to originate a new sect wherewith to render themselves notorious on earth and canonize themselves in heaven,—were it a dogmatical platitude, about which priests and laymen could dispute for centuries, and then rise from their quarrels without results,—were it not in itself and for itself comprehended in the one little word GROWTH, it might, like other bantlings, die at once instead of living to wear its proper cognomen—"Free Religion."

CHRISTIAN COMMUNISM.

The Independent of Jan. 1 contains an article, entitled "A Soul Saved," which treats of Christ's perfection-test in the case of the young man who had "great possessions." "He came running and was eager. He knelt. He asked, 'What shall I do?' He was practical. He had kept the Commandments. He was pure. He avowed that he had kept them. He had the courage of innocence. Jesus saw no pride or hypocrisy in that bold claim. On the contrary, he was won by his frankness, his simplicity, his directness, his noble soul, and his charming address. Beholding him, he loved him." And after asking, "How could there be a stronger proof of his excellence and amiability?" Gail Hamilton thinks this "test" or command one which "we none of us recognize as containing a universal principle in it." And the writer thinks it is not clear why Jesus laid such a command upon him. Was this not as "clear" and positive against holding large property by individuals, as clearly in favor of a common property or community system, as any we can refer to which influenced his disciples to commence business on that system? Can we not fairly think, from the case put, that Christ thought it "easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle" (which is impossible in the common acceptation of the assertion) than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom? Christ does not say "the needle," which might favor some distorted constructions, but "a needle." Why not treat the unjust commands and teachings of Christ just as we should those of other great teachers, holding "fast to that which is good"? Why pander to a great superstition, instead of accepting the truth? When we are sued "at the law" and our coat taken,—when we are compelled "to go a mile," or commanded to sell all that we have and give to the poor in order to "be perfect,"—let us say, like true men, that those laws and commands are unjust, and would at once make us poor, and also objects needing charity; that we will not give our cloak also,—will not go with him twain,—nor sell all and give to the poor.

That all the churches have practically said the same thing must be patent to all. No single one of them, no single pastor or layman of any of them, has the face to put those requirements into the creeds, or in any way require their observance. Yet the land is filled with would-be teachers, claiming "sanctification" or "perfection." Let such literally keep Christ's command to the young man, and they will have purchased the right to make a claim for sincerity, however much we may think them mistaken. What did Ananias, and Sapphira, his wife, think about this Christian perfection, this selling all? If they could have been shrewd enough to invent the idea that this "test" was special—intended for that one young man alone,—how quietly they might have enjoyed their possessions, and simply have "dedicated them to the Lord," as is common now-a-days, and still taken current rates for money, and otherwise lived like the "worlding"!

In view of the many liberal and worthy sentiments that have been expressed from time to time by this lady, we are surprised at what appears to be a yearning for the "flesh-pots," a tendency to run with the current manifest in a part of the article under review. Yet we feel grateful for the assertions "that it was false political economy; that it would remove the motive power of thrift, and subvert the foundations of society;" that "he had the courage of innocence;" that "he kept the commandments;" that "he was pure;" and so forth. Yours very truly,

JOHN W. GRIFFIN.

MISSIONARY TEACHINGS.

[Translated for THE INDEX from the Gartenlaube for 1873, page 770.]

It must be interesting in no slight degree to a majority of the readers of the Gartenlaube to learn in what fashion the pious emissaries of the North German Missionary Society spread their Christian doctrine upon the west coast of Africa, and how strikingly it appears from the matters presented that even the small measure of sound common sense of the rude, uninstructed negro population flares up against the pitiful religious littleness of those "enlightened" proclaimers of the so-called true salvation.

Missionary Illg says in his report concerning the Maya station, in the Monthly Journal of the North German Missionary Society (Pastor Victor, of Bremen, editor), as follows:—

"There was a sermon preached one Sunday upon II. Peter, iii., 7—12; and as a reason why the earth must be at some time consumed by fire, it was said among other things that it was spoiled and defiled by the sins of men, and that every portion of the earth's surface was spotted with blood, &c. In the evening I came to town, and greeted among others the well-known old lady Buleno. I said to her that she had not been that day at divine service, to listen to the word that certainly would have interested her very much. She presented the common excuse that on account of her work she had not been able to come, but testified a desire to have a statement then of the word she had failed to hear. As she was unwilling to understand and believe that the earth must be burned up because it was so badly spoiled, and that God would make another, &c., there stood a negro girl at her side, who repeated what had been said, and assured her it had been read and preached that very day from the word of God.

"The lady now expressed her astonishment, in her simple way, and exclaimed that the burning up of her house and all her property would be something not good, and that we ought to pray to God that it might not take place. I said to her this would be quite useless, because God could not allow sin to go unpunished, and that he would have it done in order that he might make a new earth for good men; but for that we pray, and give to the people the good word, that she and all the Mayaers may turn to Jesus, seek forgiveness of sins, and have a new heart and a new spirit created in them, and become new men, fit to inhabit that new beautiful earth. That with this end in view I relied also upon that same word of God, that God will not that any should be lost, but that every man should come to repentance. She must do this; then she would have no occasion to be afraid of that great conflagration, and she would get a new house, and a much finer one, and splendid furniture, and peace and joy of heart, so that she would no longer bestow a thought on her present possessions.

"Our conversation had brought about us a collection of people who gave an account to their friends of what had been passing."

THIS BODY is not representative, is not charged with any special or general mission, possesses no delegated powers of any sort, is probably not possessed of any information in regard to the present condition of religious work in various parts of the world not already made the common property of the churches through the enterprise of the religious and secular press; and we shall not therefore be disappointed if they adjourn after a pleasant, brotherly time, leaving things in general just as they found them. Where nothing is to do, the probability becomes strong that it will be done.—Interior.

A GENTLEMAN who laid claim to a wide literary knowledge as well as to being a great novel-reader, was asked if he had ever read "Ten Thousand a Year," and was obliged to confess that he had "never read that number in all his life."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, 10c per line.
" 13 " 25	"	8	"	"
" 26 " 51	"	6	"	"
" 52	"	5	"	"

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

INDEX TRACTS.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

BUST OF THEODORE PARKER,

BY

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak, then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished in plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

"ONE OF THE MOST ABLE, high-minded and judicious of the religious press."—Boston Journal.

"The Unitarians never had so good a paper as THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER is now. Mr. Mumford has the true editorial faculty, and makes a capital reading paper."—Springfield Republican.

"The Liberal Christian is right in speaking of Mr. Mumford's 'Brevities' in THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER as 'among the brightest and keenest paragraphing to be found in any paper, secular or religious.' Besides, they are seldom, if ever, discourteous."—Zion's Herald.

"THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER—the Unitarian paper published in this city—shows every week that dulness is not a necessary accompaniment of a people who build mainly on a literature. The vivacity and humor which make THE REGISTER welcome to the 'masses' would have been thought something quite unseemly in the days of Channing and Ware. Its columns are liberally flavored with the best kind of nature, which, always and everywhere, is human nature."—Universalist.

The above are a few of the comments bestowed of late upon

THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER,

whether rightfully or not every man should be his own judge, and in order that all may have an opportunity of forming an honest opinion, the publishers agree to send the paper to all who will send their addresses to the office, No. 7 Tremont Place, Boston.

FREE FOR SIX WEEKS

This is no trap to get your name on the subscription books, and continue sending the paper whether you wish it or not, but a bona fide offer made in good faith, with the hope that, after six weeks' reading, the persons receiving it will so appreciate its contents that they may become regular subscribers. We want men, women, boys, and girls all over the country to sell our fine Steel Engravings, Chromos, Crayon Drawings, Illuminations, Photographs, etc., etc. We now publish the finest assortment ever placed before the public, and our prices are marked down so low as to defy all competition. No one subscribes for a premium-giving paper in order to get a picture, after seeing our pictures and learning our prices. We have many old agents at work for us, who have made canvassing for books, papers, etc., their business for years, and they all report that they can make much more money at work for us than at anything else. Our prices are so low that all can afford to purchase, and therefore the pictures sell at sight at almost every house. New beginners do as well as agents who have had large experience, for our beautiful subjects and low prices are appreciated by all. To make large sales everywhere all an agent has to do is to show the pictures from house to house. Don't look for work elsewhere until you have seen what great inducements we offer you to make money. We have not space to explain all here, but send us your address and we will send full particulars, free, by mail. Don't delay if you want profitable work for your leisure hours, or for your whole time. Now is the favorable time to engage in this business. Our pictures are the finest and most pleasing in this country, and are endorsed by all the leading papers, including the New York Herald. Those who cannot give the business their entire attention can work up their own localities, and make a handsome sum without ever being away from home over night. Let all who want pleasant, profitable employment, without risking capital, send us their addresses at once, and learn all about the business for themselves. Address

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE STATE TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION of Missouri declares that there are "one hundred and fifty thou children in the State who are yet deprived of the benefits of our public school system, for the want of schoolhouses and other proper and necessary accommodations."

THE CHICAGO Post and Mail of Saturday evening, Jan. 17, has this irreverent heading over its announcements of Sunday services for the following day:—

WHERE TO WORSHIP.

A COMPLETE LIST OF THE DIFFERENT SPRINGS FROM WHENCE WILL BUBBLE SPIRITUAL INSTRUCTION TO-MORROW.

Any Number of Straight and Narrow Paths to Salvation Offered to the Wicked.

THE ITALIAN SCIENTIFIC COMMISSION, with a view to making a report at the centenary celebration in honor of Petrarch, opened the urn of red granite containing the poet's bones early in December last. "The cranium," says Nature, "of medium size, was intact, the frontal bone much developed. . . . We may conclude that Petrarch was a man of middle height and robust constitution." Now let somebody hunt up Laura's bones, and the interest of the celebration will reach its culminating point.

THE EDITOR OF Old and New did a good thing when he urged on Congress the duty of cheapening in some way the cost of telegraphic communication. The telegraph companies are paid forty times more than the post-office department, proportionally to the cost actually involved, for transmitting messages; and, because they enjoy a monopoly, they are forty times as careless. We testify from experience. The mails are sometimes bad enough; but the dictionary gives out when one comes to speak of the telegraph.

AT THE RECENT meeting of the Missouri State Teachers' Association, at Warrensburg, a resolution was adopted which expresses views we have long held respecting a vitally important, yet almost universally neglected, branch of instruction in our public schools. It was this: "Resolved: That, as citizenship under our form of government throws upon each the liability of making laws, as well as the duty of obeying the laws, the Association recommends a more careful study in all our schools of the history and Constitution of the United States and of the State of Missouri, as well as the general principles of the science of government."

PUBLIC MEETINGS in favor of the Christian Amendment to the United States Constitution have just been held in Vermont by the Caledonia County Society, which has a membership of one hundred; in Mediapolis, Iowa; in Southfield and Bloomfield, Michigan; in Greenwood, Missouri, where "Rev. Aaron Brown, of the Congregational Church, was called out and made some very earnest and pointed remarks, descanting upon the impudence and presumption of the 'Demands of Liberalism;'" and in Clarksburgh, Balm, Edinburgh, Newcastle, Salzburg, West Alexander, and Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. More than twenty are soon to be held in the same cause in the neighborhood of Northwood, Ohio, and others are to be held at points near East Liverpool, Ohio; also at Pewankee and Genesee, Wisconsin, at West Liberty, West Virginia, and other places. The Annual Convention of the National Association is to be held at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on the fourth of February. Petitions to Congress for the same object are also reported in the Christian Statesman, having from thirty-nine to one hundred and thirty-three names. One man who sent sixty-six writes: "I only received two refusals to sign out of all that I asked." And while the enemies of liberty are busily at work making public opinion, the liberals are asleep, or amuse themselves with laughing at THE INDEX because it is not asleep too.

FROM THE LOCAL papers, it is evident that Mr. Stevens has made a most favorable impression in Cincinnati. We expected no less; but with his characteristic modesty he has neglected to forward to us any copies of these papers, doubtless to avoid giving us any opportunity of making editorial comments on the flattering notices he has received. A mutual friend, however, has just shown us a copy of the Cincinnati Times of Jan. 12, which prints one of his sermons in full, and prefaces it with the following introduction:—

"For the past two Sundays Rev. A. W. Stevens, of Boston, has filled the pulpit of Rev. Thomas Vickers, promoted to the Public Library. He is rather a young man, of modest demeanor, but an accomplished rhetorician and agreeable speaker. He has already attracted many new attendants at the unique church, and excited remark at the novelty and boldness of his utterances. While his sentiments are far from orthodox, they are not repellant with harsh and cold infidelity, but refined and warm with faith and hope of the future. Yesterday morning he discoursed on 'The Seen and the Unseen,' and most beautifully and forcibly demonstrated the reality and permanency of the unseen, while the apparently real, because seen, he showed to be vanishing and perishing. His evening discourse, which we report below, was in a measure the summing up of the former, and presents the foundation of the faith, if such it may be called, of this modern church. After a voluntary from the organ, the preacher reverently, but cheerfully, uttered the following:—

"INVOCATION.

"'O, thou wondrous life of all that lives, ever being revealed yet evermore hidden, ever advancing to view yet ever receding from our sight, mystery of mysteries yet reality of realities! May our daily lives be so ordered by the love of truth, and by service of right, that whatsoever is spiritual in us may be more and more developed, and that whatever is spiritual in the outward universe may be more and more apparent to us. Amen!'"

[FOR THE INDEX.]

The Dropping from the Unitarian Year Book of William J. Potter's Name.

A SERMON IN WEST CHURCH, BOSTON, JANUARY 11, 1874.

BY C. A. BARTOL.

I know not that we must regret the forcing on our reconsideration of the question of religious fellowship by the circumstances under which, from the list of the clergy in the Unitarian Year Book, the name of one so universally-respected minister has been removed. The agents in this business were innocent and faithful, no doubt, to their best conscience and light. But the deed was nevertheless, as I must think, wrong; and for this opinion I propose to give some reasons.

I. This cutting off was on the ground of an unwarrantable emphasis of the Christian name. Jesus never gave that name,—and the disciples never bore it till, in the generation after his crucifixion, it was given to them, probably by their enemies, as a nickname in scorn. The Master spoke of what the followers should do in his name; but, in that connection, no epithet or phrase was intended; his name was a synonym in the Hebrew idiom for a thought, for sympathy, his spirit and faith; and there is no rebuke even upon the Pharisees so dreadful as on those calling him Lord, Lord, and pleading at the last day their wonderful works of mercy in his name whom in their temper and motive he could not own. The New Bedford member, Mr. Potter, does not, he says, call himself a Christian; but does not abjure the name, far less the thing; only the term Christian does not give the whole account of his consciousness and belief. But he declares himself like a tree that has grown from the Christian soil, owing to that much of its sap going into whatever flower and fruit. So he answers that his name is on the Unitarian list with his knowledge and consent. Yet, because he does not call himself a Christian, the pen is drawn through his name, and he is cut off from the fellowship, although with probably unintentional severity it is said that his church of course remains, putting it and him at odds in what can scarce fail to be an unpleasant way; and I hold this first cutting off of a man for the sake of a name—it never having been possible so to exclude Theodore Parker—an error of exaggerating the importance of nominal profession or confession in the church. It is, however, unmeant,—a cruel, irrational, unchristian and unauthorized discipline of an individual, not for defect of character or faith, but for not pronouncing the shibboleth in fashion, as true men have been shot in camps for not having the password at their tongues' end. Whether his particular construction of the name, which he would not protest against save as not covering the whole ground of knowledge and morals, were an argument for his withdrawal, should have been left to him to decide. To settle it for him, and against his choice, was excommunication, the first perhaps with which the Liberals can be charged. To raise the question was inquisition, with whatever pure and artless honesty done; and, after that, however needful it may have seemed for pride or consistent self-respect to go on to extremity of exclusion, a retreat from such procedure would, both for humility and prudence, have deserved more praise. He, that welcomed Greek and Gentile, Syrophœnician, and Jew, and poured contempt on the seed of Abraham claiming his line without doing his work, would never have so accented the adjective into which we have turned his name. Would he, if alive here and now, consent to be a Christian of any popular sort? He might turn his back on his own name! I do not call myself a Christian. If anybody choose so to call me, I will not resent the kindness or resist the good-will.

II. But, beside the reason against this course, of its being unhistoric and having no primitive Christian precedent and being an ecclesiastical abuse and afterthought, the Church cannot exist without the reconciling spirit that admits different opinions about Christ. There was, in Judea, a man casting out devils all alone by himself, the presumptuous person!—and John said to Jesus, we have forbidden him because he followeth not us. You remember the Lord's sublime answer: Forbid him not; he that is not against us is for us. Jesus did not insist everybody should train in his troop. He sacrificed no man's freedom to his own faith. He allowed everybody to serve God his own way. Casting out devils was enough for him, no matter how or in what name. If he also said, "He that is not with me is against me," he said it not for any independent worker of righteousness and mercy, but for those hypocritical Pharisees who pretended to part company because, in their blasphemy of the Holy Ghost, they said through Beelzebub he had made a blind and dumb man speak and see. But no verbal opinion about himself was his test. Being in the divine employ was the bond. Our temples, called Christian, are dedicated to God. Minister is servant; but we are not Christ's servants, at least, I am not, gladly as I consider him a master; for in his great final sermon, he told his whole band he no longer would call them such, but friends. His friend and brother, not subordinate or serf, I am my Maker's child, offspring, instrument, servant, tool for him to take up or lay down on his bench. For whoever does and suffers his will, no bar or ban! You cannot leave him out. Be his denomination or want of denomination what it may, he has the inside track. He may think Christ omniscient and eternal, his work supernatural and his word final, or he may think him a man providentially ordained by his love and truth to reorganize society through his Church; he may hold him perfect in knowledge and character, or showing, in any fault or defect, signs of his own temperament, age and race, and falling individually below the infinite ever-moving ideal, as everything human in form must;—yet he belongs to the fellowship of saints and brotherhood of all souls. For the point of union is not any judgment on a book, prophet, or creed, but devotion of heart and life to the highest in our flying mental horizon, we can imagine or conceive. Any injunction or coercion of conformity or uniformity of opinion about Christ or God or man would blow us all to pieces.

III. So I find a special reason against this sentence of exclusion in the character of the man on whom it is passed,—his entire and unaffected piety and humility. Matthew Arnold could not find a better specimen of "sweetness and light;"—one of those true gentlemen of whom an old poet says Jesus was the first, no reproach of uncleanness or ill-temper ever lighting on his name, with some of the deep, mystic devoutness in his breast thought proper to the Quaker blood, shutting out all loudness, forwardness, quarrelsomeness, or conceit, his comprehensive goodwill ill-deserving the brand of want of independence; one of those among the Free Religionists whose refutation of the charge of vainglory is in their making no reply,—too much absorbed in loyal and benign doing and discourse for any personal dispute.

Consider the logical consequence of excluding such an one. What is the object of Christianity or of being a Christian, but to be a good man; and shall Christians reject the good man they have got? If so, people will ask what is the use of being Christian? Is it something other or less than goodness? Then with it I will have naught to do! It is and has nothing for me. Good-by to the name! That will be a sad day for Christianity, should it come, when the ordinary Christian article, lay or clerical, cannot rival the unchristian. In this world's fair of character—no "vanity-fair"—the best fruit must bear off the prize, be the field or garden what it may, church inclosure or open common.

IV. It is a reason against any such boundary-line, drawn with a word, that no term or tenet can cover the whole soul and life. Humanity is larger than any form, civil or religious, it may socially take. We forget its proportions. Am I a Christian? The whole of me is not, ought not, must not be Christian. By other traits also I am rightly distinguished and described. I am an American; I come of an English, German, Sardinian breed; I am civilized after some Norman or Saxon type; I am a bud or blossom on some particular family-tree; I have a manifold culture, I am bound to a special calling or profession. My body is not my date.

> My nature is subdued
> To that it works in, like the dyer's hand.

But I have an ideal in my own soul. The seed in my constitution is but an atom, and I cannot, like a chemist, exactly state its combinations; but it has a right to grow into its own shape and produce its peculiar fruit. Beside and beyond all, I am a man, as the Roman Terence said, and hold nothing human alien from me; I belong to the race I spring from; and that sentiment on the stage, which brought down the house in thunders of applause, is the noblest we can entertain. By all these facts and thoughts I am constituted, modified and characterized, as the Supreme One appoints; and my religious following or belief, Christian or Hebrew, is but another circumstance, doubtless of great weight; yet its only worth is in the better man, the more of a man it makes me, as it is only a means among many, and not the end.

V. I state the next reason against sundering connection for a name or word, in its moral danger, on account of the evil as well as good which is covered by the best, even the Christian name. How much sanctimony and sin not only is hid, but passes current, because this stamp and superscription are on the counterfeit coin; and but how little gold even of the temple in which there is not some alloy! The grandeur is character, not creed. The boon of life, benediction of the world, the reason, in the French phrase, for being, without which we would renounce existence and back out of our lot, is to meet a man who cannot be suspected of a mean motive. But have no so-called nominal Christians motives that are mean? Are they guilty of no actions that are impure? Are not men and clergymen, in good standing, on the list of membership and at the communion-board, who are vile in practice and at heart? Have we not just heard of a Boston Baptist minister, whose baptism did not wash him, some twenty years ago, from the design and deed of adultery, now at last, having been then acquitted by the jury in Cambridge, after such lapse of time, making a clean breast by a so-styled repentance and confession and reunion with the Church, at the West? A good Orthodox brother accused to me Liberal Christianity as demoralizing, and taking away the character of God. How, I replied, with Orthodoxy, when all its discipline is powerless to examine charges of slander and corruption that have become the scandal of the continent and an ecclesiastical rot in the system and heritage of Calvin? The Christian name is no sign of grace or passport to heaven. Three persons shaking hands, or covenanting Hands off, a church shamming investigation, and a consociation asking it in vain, illustrate not the moral law.

VI. The ambiguity of meaning in the name is another reason why a man's name should not be erased on account of it. It may mean a doctrinal belief—can anybody tell us what in Christendom that is? Is the Church agreed about the divine nature, human nature, atonement, resurrection or the future life, any one of the Five Points or Thirty-Nine Articles? Why should it, how can it be agreed when Jesus had no system of theology, taught no dogmatic creed, but launched in immortal sentences ideas of duty and destiny which can be confined to no phraseology and were not confined to him, but must be seized and applied afresh by every tender conscience and inspired soul, in the new conditions of men, and to changing aspects of the world!

Is it then Christian birth rather than belief that the word means? We are Christian-born! Christ was a crystallization, better say leaven, or life-movement, reorganizing of the race so wide and far that the inveterate and many-tongued antecedents shape our persuasion and run in every drop of our blood. No legal can match this vital precedent by which Christendom is made. A man ancestrally deriving from it is of necessity in some sense Christian. He cannot be Jew, Mohammedan, Buddhist, Brahmin, or Parsee by force of fancy or dint of will. He may disown the name Christian as hackneyed, perverted, inadequate, outworn; he cannot discard the thing! What signifies my disowning my parent or child? Nevertheless my parent, whose bones are in the valley, my child still walking the earth, it is; and Christianity is in my constitution as much as any copy of my mother's heart or my father's brain. The man's name you erase is in this import of course a Christian name, and the erasure has the quality of heresy in the apostolic sense, a cutting off. The application of the knife, not what it is applied to, the surgery is unchristian, emphatically so, if the limb had no disease, could be saved and was contented to stay. I am Christian, and this church is so, at least in this organic, solidar sense, though by no act or consent of the West Church or any of its ministers, but only by official insistance outside, with no just warrant or authority, have our names been on the Unitarian Year Book, my colleague and predecessor, Dr. Lowell, making against it his annual protest, and I quiet about it and uncomplaining only because not so much concerned what we are called as what we are. How strange we could not get our name off, or Mr. Potter keep his on! In saying that we are Christian, I say this is our tradition and foreordination, an acknowledgment of kind in us which makes us more than individual particles, a homogeneous organism, a human lump. What I mean by the Christ is no historic, single person, but what the religion he started has in its immense incarnation become, a sun in the moral firmament, the rounding into whose light and heat of century-old nebulæ of error and superstition he began.

Suppose I can imagine something finer or more perfect in some respect than the individual Jesus, some Michael, Uriel, Gabriel, great and old archangel my imagination may soar to in the upper sky? I know there are, in the blue deep, outside yonder luminary, thousands of bigger suns. The star Sirius vastly exceeds, astronomers tell us, our day-star in splendor and bulk. But our day-star, like our father and mother, is ours, source of light and heat, leaf and flower and fruit on the earth; and the faith, set by Providence in our human firmament, is our spiritual sun.

But beyond birth or belief Christian signifies, in its best sense, a spirit. We think of all that is kind and just, meek and holy, faithful and patient, generous and good in our knowledge and experience; and, by a sort of common consent, trace it or not distinctly to a past image or text, we give it that name. If this be the criterion, and there is no other, the excision of my friend and brother from the catalogue was a mistake. I am absolved, in the premises, from indelicacy in declaring that, in all these noble qualities, he is anybody's peer. I would covet admission for any of you or for myself into the peerage of love and reverence he adorns. Wherever, on whomever, a stain may rest, none on his escutcheon. May they who stay equal him who goes!

VII. So I state one reason more in the injury of this process of elimination to the Church. For what is the Church? Not a number of establishments, with cathedrals or conventicles, of contending sects, any more than quarrelsome territories like Texas or Utah on a border-line compose the State. The Church is Christian society, that part of the community, in its catholic claim leaving out none, which is by the divine influence permeated and raised. If you shut it up in narrower limits, you make it a close corporation, which proverbially has no soul. If you alienate from it any excellence, you mutilate it. If Christ's Body means all concrete good, you heal not but wound it by whatever human worth you omit; for our religion must swallow the world or be swallowed by it; and if any nobility of genius or disposition be ruled out by the Orthodox, so much the worse for Orthodoxy; excluded by Liberals, so much the worse for Liberality; or, dismissed from the Christian name, so much the worse for Christianity. A young woman abroad mused on the crucifixion till the stigmata, or marks of the nails in the Lord's hands and feet, by a physiological law, appeared in hers. Beware lest what you persecute and banish be stigmatized likewiselwith the spikes driven through the flesh of him whose cause you boast! Undeserved suffering is his badge. He that bears that cross is, without his name, nearer to him than he who, without the suffering, bears the name. For one, I repudiate the name as a title to social or denominational favor. For it never meant truly membership in good standing, in the accredited phrase, but rather to be suspected, and pursued, and hunted out of reputation and life; and still to be without the camp is to be with Christ. A deacon in Lynn, in a meeting for the poor, drove out the company and shut off the gas because, he said, the building was desecrated by the nation's flag at the desk! Who was the desecrator; and who is crucifier afresh, but he that postpones humanity to party?

VIII. The last reason against exclusiveness is its ignorance of the times and improvidence for those to come. All is in motion. We must not try to stop the flux of thoughts or things. At no pillars of any dogmatic Hercules, within the straits of no moral Gibraltar, can we stay; but as the Mediterranean flows spite of the craggy walls into a larger sea, all our notions and institutions must proceed. I am, or have unecclesiastically been, a Unitarian; but Unitarianism is not the last word of God. It divides into two tendencies, one back to be reabsorbed into the old body whence it came, another forward into new freedom and faith. A few aged conservatives, or old indeed while young in years, may have planted their feet to stick so that they cannot be raised for another step; but the fresh life feels the current, catches the wind, sails on, as did Abraham, Jesus, Paul, as Luther did, to regions beyond.

I do not denounce the official act. For a certain purpose somewhere the line must be drawn. To preserve a constitution or close communion, exclusiveness at a particular point may be the true policy and a frank duty for such as have for that end put their strength and honor and means in pledge and pawn. Denominations doubtless have still a work to do; but undenominations have a greater. You fence out more than you fence in, though with a circuit for your railing broad and big as the Chinese wall. Yet that God never made a boundary thin as a knife-blade, wide as a hair, is the last word of science, and but figures a cordial truth of the soul; no coming out of any, inclusion for all!

Such are my reasons for personally, in my position, viewing the late transaction with regret. Yet the policy prompted by an instinct of self-preservation may be wise and well-meant. Some specifications an association must have for its work; and by that called Unitarian how many a stint, in planting new churches, maintaining old, protecting the weak, sending out missionaries and books, has been beneficently done! But the fancied need of expulsion for honest freedom of thought from its almanac or its ranks is at least demonstration of other tasks than it has undertaken, and perhaps beyond its reach. Only be the good spirit in our difference of method or mind! Let order show radical and progress conservative respect, to harmonize the social fixture and flux! Church and State are, with changing growth and expression, the community's double-front or bi-form face. There must be features and unfolding too; let me belong to the unfolding! Natural development, inevitable evolution must not be despised as heartless speculation. It is a travail, as of a woman when her time is come, attended with groanings that cannot be uttered, to bring forth and manifest not the children of men, but the sons of God, however some accept no proof of feeling but noise and shouting, the scream of trumpets or the windy blast that "freezes while it roars," though mixed with ostentatious tears. But true fervor is tranquil as the dawn or noon-day. The swiftest motion, like a planet's, is without sound; and the Chief Magistrate's order is to move on. Move on, indeed! How like a troop over some hill-top our dear ones sink without a syllable articulated back of what the horizon hides! Read the Necrology for 1873, and note the world's loss. But immortality is not any point invisible to us they have reached; it is, aside from any chronology, their and our steady advance; and the argument for continuance is that, without our fellows, we are crippled and cannot be ourselves.

> "I cannot unlock my heart;
> The key is gone with them,"— but not mislaid or lost. They have it still! Happy day when no longer—

> "The silent organ loudest speaks
> The Master's requiem;"

but its lid is open, and every note at nobler command.

Meanwhile forget not the bar of backward as well as forward look. Conduct, charming in momentary appearance, how oft looks different, in memory, and in history which is the memory of mankind! Some would have expelled Theodore Parker from the Unitarian body and from the Boston Association, but they, now happily for themselves if not for him, failed! Who of his opponents, in the denomination, would not be sorry to have succeeded in that expunging, now he is classed with Channing in his fame? How well I remember the movement at the ministers' meeting to call him to account, my own defence of his right, my resolution, though not entirely according with him then or now, to be driven out myself if he was, and the flood of uncontrollable tears with which not opposition but sympathy forced him to rush from the assembly, which he would not disorder with his weeping, down the stairs! Does any liberal thinker deny to him now what is good in the Christian name; or would any one abolish his own name, now it has become a star? He died in the odor of sanctity, though he had gone to the "funeral of his affections" while alive; for time is the test of character and unveiler of truth, and in the perspective of years the man hated as a militant, and himself administering, no doubt as a doctor, a wholesome bitter prescription to superstition and sin, is enshrined, beheld as on a mount of transfiguration; by the angry vaporing against him he is lifted beyond his actual intellectual dimensions, as the misty mirage exalts a ship or island to tower above the sea. Florence, beautiful with art, is more so for holding his tomb. He was Christian in the best meaning, as a lover of God and man, fulfilling the two commands on which Jesus hung all the law and the prophets. What is Christianity? No name or phrase or form, but to think and feel, be and do, not as Christ did, but as he would among us now, under whatever banner, in whatever cause. Through the name of any one modelled thus would he draw the pen?

> "The rank is but the guinea's stamp:"

and the gold in the temple, if from nature's veins, need not issue from any mint. Is not the Hindu Chunder Sen more Christian than some Doctors of Divinity whom we know; and would he not be more welcome and edifying in this desk? Thanks, notwithstanding, for the Christian orb! Sirius, that distant tremendous sun, which the improved telescope shows, myriads of miles away beyond the blue ether, boiling over with measureless cataracts of light and heat, cannot warm our earth, quicken a seed, open a bud, ripen a berry or redden a plum. We must have our own system and centre for that; and it was, I think, a mistake in James Mill, the father of John Stuart, to try to take his boy quite out of the atmosphere of the time. Let us, with whatever watchful jealous care, accept an influence from the venerable forms of piety handed down; and, while adjusting all to reason and right, not quarrel with our circulations, as though it were possible, or useful if we could, to separate our own from the general constitution. Genius and virtue will savor of the soil and climate in which they grow; and the individual, attempting to be universal, is the frog in the fable swelling toward the size of the ox; for so the intellect bursts into abstraction and loses personal force. Said to me Rubinstein, one of the six men of genius I have known, Though I am cosmopolite, I am Russian, and cling to my country with special love. I sympathize with him in that! The good man, who is a Free Religionist, is somehow, and cannot help it, Christian too. The top of beauty is that spontaneous inspired goodness which none can classify or comprehend:

> "Glad hearts, without reproach or blot,
> Who do thy will, and know it not."

In fine: the programme of the future has no scripture, though called Christian, of sect. Unity is the word of science; humanity is one; and Dr. Hamlin, the matchless missionary to Constantinople, and president of Robert College, tells me such is the tendency to which, in the East, with which he of all Americans has best acquaintance, Greek and Jew, Bulgarian and Mohammedan converge. If the word Christian, which with Martineau I would still use, though not enforce, is to cover the whole, it must be on condition of being as great as man. What is God but the Oneness that hides, in the hunt of philosophy, under the guise of gravity, electricity, magnetism, light, always the same power, identical with thought? What is attraction in the outward universe but love, and wisdom but the shining from its heat, and heat motion, and motion will and life, a single essence, entitled as you will, matter or mind, and the joy of each to be part of this eternal indestructible all? What is religion but the soul's sense of this relation which is by the absolute forever woven and resumed! In the term unitarian our parents were wiser than they dreamed, hinting, beyond any bald Hebrew numerical Monotheism, that harmony of the universe which it is genius to see and piety to feel; and recognizing which will solve and relieve us altogether from the problem of leaving out any of the names that no Year Book could contain,—as we read, if all Jesus did were recorded, the world would not hold the writing.

Religious Songs of the Negroes.—The song oftenest sung during the second year of the war was that rare melody, "Roll, Jordan, roll." Sometimes it began,

> "Massa Linkum sittin' on de tree ob life,
> Watchin' Jordan roll;
> Gen'l Fremont sittin' on de tree ob life,
> Roll, Jordan, roll," and so on, through a list of all the public men dear to the negro heart. At another time it began with the name of the pastor of the church, or the leader of the meeting, and enumerated a dozen or twenty brethren and sisters as to whose religious standing there could be no doubt. I remember that, on one occasion, a singer introduced the name of "Brudder Brown," when the singing was interrupted by a woman with, "Does you mean Brudder Peter Brown? Caze if you means Fairfax Brown I calls for order!" A satisfactory explanation followed, whereupon the conductor of the meeting asked another brother to "lead in prayer for Fairfax Brown, and pray that he may return from his backslidin'." Frequently the song began with,

> "Lo'd Jesus sittin' on de tree ob life, and brought in the names of Moses, Joshua, Elijah, David, Solomon, John, Paul, and pretty much everybody else of good report in the Bible, duly elevating them to a position on "de tree ob life, watchin' Jordan roll." At times the white visitor could not help smiling at the placing there of certain public men; yet it was never otherwise than delightful to hear the packed audience strike the notes of this joyful and swinging and resonant melody.—Atlantic Monthly.
> Watchin' Jordan roll;"

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION.

DISCUSSION BY THE LIBERAL LEAGUE—THE AMOUNT OF NON-TAXABLE PROPERTY IN THE STATE—CHURCH PROPERTY IN THE STATE AND IN THE UNITED STATES—HON. MOSES KIMBALL TO BRING THE MATTER BEFORE THE LEGISLATURE—PROPOSED MASS MEETING IN TREMONT TEMPLE—WENDELL PHILLIPS AND WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON TO BE INVITED TO SPEAK, ETC., ETC.

At the meeting of the Boston Liberal League, at Parker Memorial Hall last evening, the question of exemption of church property from taxation was made the subject for discussion. After preliminary business, the Chairman of the Executive Committee reported that a tract entitled "An Appeal for Equal Taxation and No Exemption" had been prepared and circulated throughout the State to the number of twelve thousand, from half a dozen to fifty being sent to towns from which requests had been received. The tract is based upon the report of Daniel A. Gleason, Esq., Deputy Tax Commissioner, which sets forth that, in 1870, of the non-taxable property held for religious or charitable purposes in towns and cities, the amount of $22,862,697 was in the one item of meeting-houses; and that thirty-five cities and towns contain untaxed meeting-houses valued in the aggregate at over $100,000. The tax upon this property is estimated at the rate of $14.49 per $1000, and produces an amount of $391,280.48 which the tract says must be made up by assessing other property above its fair proportion. It further adds that with the non-taxable property of educational, charitable, and agricultural institutions, the total amount of property in the State untaxed is $37,440,840, and that the tax upon the same would be $542,083.07. The total value of church property in the United States is given as amounting in 1850 to $87,328,801; in 1860, $171,397,932; and in 1870, $354,483,581. Approximations are also given for each decade till 1900, when, it is supposed, the value will be $2,835,868,648. At the same time, it says that the rate of increase of church property is much greater than the rate of increase of the number of churches, showing that it is not so much the multiplication of new churches as it is the enrichment of existing churches which must be taken to explain this astoundingly rapid accumulation of wealth; and showing that the exemption of church property is as unnecessary to the churches as it is unjust to the people; also, that the number of church-members is relatively decreasing and church property increasing in geometrical ratio; and that the United States are thus fostering within their own borders the development of a vast moneyed aristocracy. The gentleman also stated that the services of Hon. Moses Kimball had been secured to bring the matter before a joint special committee of the Legislature, to be appointed, and that petitions were being drawn up in all parts of the State and presented for a law which should give to Massachusetts equal taxation and no exemption.

[This statement is not quite correct. Mr. Kimball presented to the House of Representatives the petition of the Liberal League, which on his motion was referred to a joint special committee of the House and Senate. He has since presented a list of 1,150 names attached to the "Massachusetts Petition" circulated by the League.—Ed.]

REMARKS OF FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

The President then introduced Mr. Francis E. Abbot, who answered some points given by parties in New Jersey against an amendment proposed to their State Constitution for the abolition of this exemption of church property from taxation. The points to which he referred were: First, that church edifices are erected by voluntary contributions, and yield no income; a tax upon them would therefore be an oppressive taxation of benevolence. Second, the exemption is not unjust, because churches enhance the value of property in the community, and promote good morals. Third, the nation being, in a general sense, a Christian one, it should not burden active benevolence. Fourth, the purity and perpetuity of our republican form of government depend upon the virtue and morals of the people, and to compel the taxation of institutions for Christian education would be to strike a heavy blow at the only possible safeguard to free institutions. To the first proposition, that churches yield to their owners no income, and therefore should not be taxed, he had two answers. One was, that other property beside churches yields no income and yet is taxed; the other was, that taxes were not laid on property because it yields an income, but because of the expense of protecting it. He supposed himself the owner of a newly-built store, in the time of the panic, which he could not let nor pay the taxes upon, but which would not on the ground of yielding no income be exempted by the City Assessor. The houses that men live in, he said, do not yield them any income except to save them from the expense of hiring; and in just that way church edifices save the owners the expense of hiring halls for religious worship. Taxes are paid for the cost of protection, and they are supposed to be assessed to that extent, and no more. To a certain extent the State is an insurance company, which, for the tax paid to it, insures the owner of property against mobs, burglars, fire, and a great many perils. All this has its cost, and for it he is expected to pay his share. The second proposition is to some extent true. In some cases the building of a church upon a street makes it more eligible for residences. But the great cause of the increase of valuation of real estate is not from the building of churches; it is the general business growth of the community. The men on your business streets do a hundredfold more to enhance the value of your real estate than all the ministers and churches in the whole country. Their industry and activity, their general intelligence and devotion to general objects, to the promotion of trade and to the development of the country—all these things tell on the value of property, and raise the value of real estate far more than any church edifices can. As to the increase of good morals, that may be conceded to some extent, but denied perhaps to a greater. But the teaching of good morals is not the primary object of the Church. On the contrary, you will find that morals are not very important, but that faith in the Lord Jesus Christ is the chief end of the Church. But the cry is, "Don't tax benevolence." Churches, they say, depend upon the contributions of philanthropic individuals, by disinterested men who find it hard to donate the charities they bestow. If you tax the churches, you increase the burden. Now I do think that the churches in this way have done something to make the world better. Man is nobler and better for living for something outside of himself. The moment a man has an object outside the circle of his own narrow selfishness, and is willing to give out of his earnings or savings, he has in him the right spirit of humanity, and so far as the churches have promoted this, so far they have done good in the world. That is something to be considered. I don't know any stronger argument. But exemption on that account is not justice, and justice is the first consideration. This system of exemption is a sort of qualification upon benevolence. The State meets the philanthropist half way. It encourages benevolence in some at the cost of injustice to others; it gives an equal sum with the benevolent man, and grinds it out of the unbeliever, and I protest against it. I say, let unbelievers give or withhold, and let them have justice in the office of benevolence. To exempt church property, therefore, is not only to encourage the virtues of the pious, but is to discourage and burden the benevolence of those who are not pious. With regard to the last proposition, you might just as well say that slavery is the bulwark of republicanism as to say that the Church is; or to say that by taxing the property you would weaken the chief support of free intelligence, and sap the foundation of republican institutions. In conclusion, Mr. Abbot said that the more he considered this movement the more fully he was satisfied that it rested on inherent justice. In demanding that all property shall bear its fair share of taxation, they were only demanding what was due by the abstract law of right. They were not infringing upon any right, nor acting in a spirit of hostility, because a spirit of justice was a spirit of friendliness between man and man; to be just was to be kind. He then recommended the distribution of fifty thousand copies of the tract presented throughout the State; the presentation of petitions to the Legislature, and the appointment of a finance committee to obtain subscriptions for the expense of a grand mass meeting in Tremont Temple, at which Wendell Phillips, William Lloyd Garrison, and other speakers of well-known ability should be invited to make addresses. The proposition met with approval, and will probably be carried out.

REMARKS OF ADDISON DAVIS.

Mr. Davis was then introduced by the President, and said that he considered the question before them a very short animal, very soon curried. The ground upon which he stood was that this whole question of exemption from taxation of church property was opposed to the genius of the Government under which we live. He did not think the Government had anything to do with favoring one kind of religious doctrine more than another, or none at all. The Government was simply to protect all who lived under it, and all should bear their share of the burden of governing the nation or State. He referred to the time when the direct tax was laid for the benefit of the Presbyterian Church, and told the story that the assessors took planks which belonged to his father, who was a carpenter and a Baptist, and sold them for his share of the tax. Though the direct tax was now abolished, he thought the present system of exemption was a sly way of making one class of citizens pay for the privileges of another. If they didn't take the cows, as in Glastonbury, they had a sly way of stealing the milk. Referring to the burning of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, he asked why they should be allowed to build such a huge structure as that was, which was liable to take fire and endanger other property, and which, as it was, cost the city $10,000, without being called upon to pay its proportionate share in the cost of general protection which it had in a measure made necessary.

MR. HORACE SEAVER

was then introduced, who said he couldn't make a speech unless he were inspired. He thought the question before them was one which required much agitation. It seemed to him that almost everything was taxed, but somehow or other the Church seemed to stand upon a holy hill and say, "I am holier than thou. I am the great exempted. Don't tax me." [Laughter.] A gentleman had said, when arguing the matter, that the Church was the great instructor of the people, and therefore ought not to be taxed; and, again, he said the Church is of heavenly origin. To this he had replied that he didn't know much about heaven, but the property of the Church seemed to be of the earth, earthly. As for instruction, he believed in that, because he hadn't much himself. It was his opinion that the institutions for education could, with the best grace, be exempted, because they were secular, and not sectarian. While in European countries people were trying to get rid of a national church and to leave every one perfect liberty, there seemed to be in our country a strong effort to create that very thing, by the attempt to introduce God in the Constitution, and by exempting the property of certain sects from taxation. He thought the latter unjust, and of the former said an effort might as well be made to introduce the sun, moon, and stars into the Constitution for fear people might not recognize their existence. The speaker was followed by other gentlemen whose ideas coincided with those which had been previously expressed, after which the discussion was brought to a close and the meeting adjourned.—Boston Post, Jan. 24.

HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES.

"PHILANTHROPY."

BY COLONEL T. W. HIGGINSON, JAN. 18.

Colonel T. W. Higginson lectured in the Free Religious Course, in Horticultural Hall, yesterday afternoon, his subject being "Philanthropy, the Word, its Sign and Meaning." Some one has said, Colonel Higginson began, that there is more to be learned from language itself than all that has been learned by its aid; the attributes of a race may be changed, and owe their change to words. When a word comes into existence, its meaning is carved on the race whose language contains it. When you take a word which stands for a virtue, you may be sure that the nation which originated it knew what that virtue was. This, said the lecturer, I shall try to illustrate by stating some facts in the history of the word philanthropy, and these must have interest for all of us, for we all have an interest in the welfare of the human race. We are all concerned in the record of the race, and so in this word, which expresses the love of man for man during the last eighteen hundred years, for aught we know. But to carry it back to the beginning of another history is enough for our purpose.

The word philanthropy is a comparatively modern one in the English language. For instance, when the Pilgrim Fathers first set foot on Plymouth Rock, it is doubtful if any one of them had ever heard a syllable of the word. We know with something like an approach to certainty when the word came into use, whence it was taken, and for what use it was designed. The first seen of this word is in the thirteenth of Lord Bacon's essays, that on the Goodness of Nature. This is the first instance known to me of the introduction of the Greek word anglicized in form into an English book. The essay, probably, was first published in this shape in the year 1612, and if this be so, it is certain that the word crept into use in the next five years, and got an English ending. The word has now assumed its present form, and is defined as a loving of many, the original Greek word being so derived. So we have the first appearance of the word tolerably well fixed between 1612 and 1617. The word was at first so uncommon that John Dryden, when he used it seventy years later, apologized for doing so, and affixed an explanatory note. This word did not come, as many of our words do, indirectly from the Greek through the Latin language; it was a direct transplantation from the Greek, and was recognized as such by the men who first used it.

The original word has a very illustrious position in Greek history and literature. It gives the key-note to what is, perhaps, the greatest of dramatic poems, and it gives the key-note to one of the sublimest lives that ever was lived, that of Socrates. The word can be traced back to the year 776 before the present era, and that is regarded as almost the limit of authentic history. We have, then, a virtue called Philanthropy, which dates back so many years before Christ. The word was carved into the Greek language, and was recognized by the Grecians, and yet we, speaking a language in which the word was unknown for many centuries, and into which it was introduced at last because there was no English word to convey the same idea, we have a way of claiming the virtue the word expresses as an exclusively modern one. We limit it by a new term—Christian philanthropy,—and claim that its illustrations can be found only in four Gospels, in which the word is never so much as used in its original form. But it is an ancient word, and only recently, by adoption, at all modern. Is it essential to Christianity, in order to prove its doctrines, to annihilate the Greek language? Is it not nobler to say, with Jerome, we trust no one is born without God, or has not in himself the seeds of virtue.

There was another use of the word in the Greek language; it was used as a tribute to the Deity. It was also used by the Christian fathers much in the same way that we use "excellency" or "worship," in such expressions as your excellency, your worship. When the word was first used, philanthropy had not been taken or regarded as a profession. There was no taint of suspicion then, as there is now, in connection with philanthropists. When we come to the practical application of philanthropy, there is no doubt that it plays a larger part in America to-day than in Greece two thousand years ago. The love of men for each other is as old as literature, as old as history, and perhaps as old as man himself. Wherever it has been conspicuous in one human soul, as in Jesus Christ, a new strength has been added to it in after years. But we still are far enough from the day when all weapons shall be laid aside, and men shall love one another. Under Christian theology, you are to love God and man, but the trouble is with this that, once impair your faith in God, and the obligation to love man is impaired. Then again, Christian philanthropy is too apt to narrow itself into the mere reflection of a great personality. In Christianity, you love man because the love of Christ constrains you. We love, and should love, men for themselves. Philanthropy is more than good nature, though good nature sometimes serves as a foundation for it. It is an easy luxury to feed the hungry and to teach the ignorant—that is the recreation of the philanthropist. The philanthropist's real work is where he saves whole classes of men to his own peril. This is the true philanthropy.

He who feeds alone saves few,
He serves all who dares be true.

OPTIMISM.

AN ABSTRACT OF A SERMON PREACHED BY W. J. POTTER AT THE PARKER MEMORIAL HALL, JAN. 18, 1874.

Paul has made use of words like these to express his opinion upon a question of vital interest: "All things work together for good to those who love God." All people would like to believe in this proposition of his. Some do, or at least find, or think they find, sufficient assurance of its truth in the experience of life to warrant them in holding firmly to Paul's doctrine. Most of us at times doubt it. Things seem so averse to good, not only in their tendency but in their results, that we cannot realize it convincingly. Even if faith steps in and asserts that it must be so, the lingering traces of doubt remain, and we cannot confidently assume that there is even a basis of proof. Faith may say that things are the best possible as they are; but if reason gets no clew, all the assumptions are unsatisfactory and deluding. It is hard to keep back intruding questionings so that the mind may assert unanswerably that it knows. To say that we believe it must be so is to beg the question rather than answer it. Our hopes and aspirations encourage us to trust the soundness of Paul's verdict, but experience brings no additional evidence to substantiate it; and it is natural to trust the veracity of experience. "Faith is the substance of things hoped for," but hope is not knowledge, aspiration is not proof. Reason may accept the bias of the mind, and the belief that all tends to good be virtually assented to; but few can keep constant sureties for their trust and never have cause for doubt. Faith may be good evidence of things not seen, but things known forbid the possibility of its constant acceptance as sufficient to allay all doubt. Things seen are sometimes so inscrutably dark, so wonderfully unproductive of present help, that faith can in no way explain how they will result in good. The belief that the world is the best possible is a comforting theory, but after all it is only a theory. Optimisms may be good in moments of serenity, pleasant to dwell upon when the mind is unclouded and at ease; but it offers no solace, affords no refuge when one needs it most. When disaster and distress, sorrow and trial come, when the iron enters the soul, it is the reverse of easy to be an optimist. Those who have felt the blight of constant disappointment, who have been smitten with some sudden grief, cannot believe that "whatever is, is right." The burden presses down too heavily to allow that. It would take away the motive power of life and existence, and from such a point of view the doctrine that all appears the best possible in the eye of the Infinite is false in theory and in essence. What an idea of God is this! It is groundless in reason and dangerous in morals. To assert that God can look calmly on vice and crime, on every species of wickedness and injustice, because he sees that good will come out of it, violates the very idea of goodness.

But to say that the world is the best possible, considering the condition of humanity, is allowable. While man is a prime agent in improving his own moral and intellectual status, such a theory may hold good. Man's growth necessitates such conditions and such experiences. Why he was made so is another question. But upon him devolves the tremendous task of working out his own destiny, and a higher destiny involves the actualities of existence. Perhaps we may all become angels; but we must reach that height by our own efforts, if we reach it at all. There is no vital, assured angelhood; choice, desire and continual struggle to better one's condition, will only result in approximate realization.

It is best we should be less free and responsible. Moral intelligence is to be trusted, and moral intelligence and intelligent effort work together for good. But it must not be affirmed that one act is as good for the purpose as another. God forbid that in any unconditioned sense we should say that all things work together for good, or that ultimate good is always the result. When men keep clear in their own minds the distinction between right and wrong, when they work with earnest, zealous purpose, then good results are not conditional. In this restricted sense all things may be said to work together for good, with man as the worker. To look up and not down, to strive to do the right, to love and aim at the good, these are the transmuting helps which make the work of value. Those who work from low motives ought not to expect excellent results from their labors. Mankind progress in proportion to their activity. "The elect," says Beecher, "are those who will; the non-elect are those who wont." Creative works through human energy; not by folding the hands, not by idle dreaming, is the result gained, but by tireless, resistless, earnest, and enthusiastic effort. We rise to the height of our aspiration upon the ladder of our deeds. Evil may sometimes be overruled for good, but the real good comes from the Herculean struggles of those who see and set themselves to the task of righting the wrong. Rational wills help to promote the thing excellent in itself, and we defeat evil when we lay hold of goodness with our whole strength. This is the alembic of change and regeneration and progress. All is a struggle for existence, a survival of the fittest—rather a survival of the worthiest. Science shows the mistake of the theologian and philosopher. In Nature huge and monstrous growths have given place to more beautiful and useful things; so in civilization that which is vicious and unnatural succumbs to that which is best and most helpful. In the first steps of evolution there is not only life but motion,—a power sufficient to sweep all obstacles away. Resistance is the condition of development, incidental to growth; but good is more than condition, more than incident. It gives not only impulse but a goal. It is a providence in the affairs of the world and of men,—a providence immovably established in the past and present, and communicable to the future. E. G. B.

THE CONVERSION OF DUMAS FILS.

There is a small village near Dieppe called Puys, where only a few fishermen live in winter. The Marquis of Salisbury has found its situation so charming that he has built a large house on the cliff which overlooks the sea, where he lives in complete retirement, with his children, in the warm season. The place was, however, not discovered by him, and not far from his beautiful country place is a small house which Alexander Dumas fils built many years ago. The name of Alexander Dumas is just now in every mouth, since the appearance of his new piece, La Femme de Claude, and I may, perhaps, be permitted to apply to him the method of Sainte-Beuve, which consists in studying the man before the author. It is no libel to say, what everybody knows, that Alexander Dumas the father lived all his life, to his very last day, outside the rules and conventions of the world. His son is not legitimate; from his early years he was accustomed to see his father surrounded with men and women of pleasure, spending money as fast as he made it. Alexander Dumas the father had all the charms and all the defects of the race to which he belonged; he was gay, thoughtless, generous, fond of all the luxuries of life, a child in character, a materialist in philosophy. His son did not inherit his character; the sight of disorder made him very orderly; the extravagance of his father taught him the value of capital. He became soon the protector, the banker of the famous novelist; he has carefully acquired for himself a good fortune. He is almost melancholy in his disposition, with a decided tinge of bitterness which is found in most natural children. Notwithstanding his name, he had great difficulty in making his way in the literary world; he has not the easy manner of his father; he works slowly, with difficulty. His first books were hardly noticed, and they certainly were vastly inferior to his later ones. He has been constantly working, improving his style, enlarging his ideas. But the most curious trait of his character is this: born and educated, as it were, out of the pale of religion and of morality, he has gradually constructed for himself a system of morality. He considers himself, and he is to a certain extent, an inventor. Just as the once famous Caussidière said that he had, during a revolution, made order out of disorder, Dumas has extracted virtue out of vice. His merit in this respect can only be well understood by those who have had some insight into the famous demi-monde, which he has attempted to paint, and in which he has spent the greater part of his life, with the extraordinary society so well depicted already by Balzac, which combines adventurers, journalists, literary men, modern Aspasias, rich bankers, demoralized foreigners of every race. The Rastignacs, the Bixious, the Mesdames Marnesse, of Balzac, have multiplied tenfold during the Empire; they form a dangerous freemasonry of wit, of beauty, of elegance, of scepticism. The younger Dumas's genius has drunk all the poisons of the Parisian hot-house, and, by a curious law of contrast, these poisons have finally produced in his mind a mania for preaching and moralizing; only he preaches on the stage. He has not the austerity of an apostle, neither does he wish to render vice attractive, but he knows that vice is often attractive.

His conversion has been a slow one, and it has been long unconscious. There is a curious development from the Dame aux Camélias, where his heroine is still made interesting and lovable, to the Femme de Claude, who is an incarnate devil, black with every crime. How was this conversion operated? Not by religion. Dumas has not been influenced by the lessons of the Church; he has only learned the hard lessons of life; but this would not have been enough. He has been converted to virtue by science, and the originality of his morality lies especially in this fact that it is scientific. I must explain this expression: Dumas, like Sainte-Beuve, like Taine, like Renan, has been very attentive to the discoveries of science. The doctrine of development, the theories of Darwin, have a deep connection with social questions. Darwinism, which has assumed in England a strictly scientific character, has been applied in France to the development of races, of the human mind, finally of human societies. If there is any truth in a theory which has found anatomical links between mankind and the simian tribe, there must surely be also relations which are not of a physical order. In a word, it may be said that there is still an animal in man, that in every one of us there is the simian department of instinct and the human department of intelligence, of will, and of morality. The analysis of the passions has been undertaken from this new point of view, and it has been carried very far by physiologists as well as by philosophers. I may perhaps be allowed to cite, in connection with this subject, a few lines from the preface of the second edition of Les Problèmes, which has just appeared:—

"Darwin has shown how the smallest advantage assures the supremacy of an animal variety. But where is the animal which can himself conquer any instrument of supremacy? Man only can do it; he can modify his body by hygiene, by medicine, by exercise, by dress, by architecture; but he can conquer other advantages than strength, stature, health, fecundity: he has an all-powerful arm, intellect, which he can sharpen. . . . There is a natural selection of man, but human liberty is one of the forces which rule this selection; and the more civilization advances, the more this force predominates. . . . Science shows man, peoples, races, that existence is a perpetual struggle; it does not invite them to laziness, but to work; its teachings are the same as those of morality, which orders self-command, sacrifice, order, moderation, stoicism."

From an Epicurean, Dumas, under the influences of science, has become finally a moralist; he has learnt that in the passion of love, which chiefly concerns the novel-writer and the dramatist, there is something vile and simian mixed up with something which may be called divine. There are various stages of this passion, as well as of any other, which at a given time get personified and embodied not only in individuals, but in nations and races. In his last curious book called L'Homme-Femme, he classifies women thus: Women of the temple, women of the fireside (the home), women of the streets—saints, matrons, and sinners. Now, all his dramatic theory is founded on the belief that these three classes, which are convertible by the slow action of selection, are totally inconvertible at a given time. He goes even further; just as Agassiz has called prophetic types those types which in the palæontological succession appear, so to speak, before their time, Dumas believes that there are always types of the simian age, even in the most cultured and moral societies. The femme de Claude is one of those types. She is the mere slave of instinct; she follows her career of adultery, of crime, of vice, without any remorse, without any doubt; she cannot be converted. This Calvinistic doctrine of total depravity has somewhat horrified the French public. It goes directly against those pleasant milk-and-water theories of sin and repentance. Your guilty wife, your bad mother, your femme de Claude, who robs the scientific secret of her husband in order to sell it herself, is fallen from grace; kill her. And he does kill her at the end of the fifth act; her husband becomes her judge and her executioner.—Paris Correspondence of the Nation.

FRANCOIS HUGO'S FUNERAL.

ENTHUSIASTIC DEMONSTRATION OF THE FREE-THINKERS OF PARIS—TEN THOUSAND WORKMEN PRESENT.

The population of Paris made an extraordinary manifestation of sympathy with Victor Hugo on the occasion of the burial of his son François. From an early hour the approaches to No. 20 Rue Drouot, where François Victor Hugo died, were blocked by a dense crowd. The house itself, garrets, staircases, and balconies, was thronged by friends. The venerable poet, seventy-two years old, appeared as chief mourner, and walked bare-headed all the way to Père la Chaise Cemetery, three miles. As the procession passed along the boulevards, the closely serried masses which lined either side bowed respectfully, while tears started from many an eye at the sight of the grand old man, with snowy white hair and beard, bowed down with grief. The Paris correspondent of the Daily News says:—

"Those who followed the cortége in the anticipation of a row were disappointed. The Government very wisely abstained from any interference other than sending a few policemen to clear the way for the cortége. But they must have returned deeply impressed by the reality of the demonstration of which the funeral was but the pretext. There were fully ten thousand workmen present; all steady, comparatively well-dressed men, most of them wearing in their button-holes the sprig of red immortelles, which forms the distinguishing emblem of the free-thinking community. They had evidently availed themselves of the opportunity to count their numbers, and the friends of order who were present and kept their eyes open cannot but have had very disagreeable reflections suggested to them by the sight of the strength, order, and discipline of the enemies of existing institutions. Groups of workmen who were stationed all along the road taken by the cortége joined it as it passed, so that when it reached the cemetery of Père la Chaise the numbers must have been double what they were at starting. The cemetery is a very large one, and it was almost entirely filled. The crowd clambered over the graves, climbed into the trees, and perched themselves on the top of monuments, anxious to get a sight of the coffin and the chief mourners. When the body was lowered into its temporary resting-place, all these men, who fancy themselves unbelievers, reverently uncovered, and compelled their more strong-minded companions to put out their pipes and drop their cigarettes."

Although the burial was without the church rites, Victor Hugo expressly charged Louis Blanc, who delivered an oration over the grave, to say that he and his beloved son believed in God and the immortality of the soul, but not in the necessity of priesthood. When earth was thrown on the coffin, multitudes pressed round Victor Hugo to shake hands with him. Many contented themselves with touching him. The crowd dispersed, crying, "Vive Victor Hugo!" "Vive Louis Blanc!" and "Vive la Republique!"—Globe.

HERE IS A PRETTY Italian popular song. We copy it from the Fedele, of Lucca: "Friars and priests we no longer want. We wish to crush them beneath our feet. Long live the International. We are Garibaldians, and want no God or Christ. To the dust with the Madonna. Long live Antichrist. Long live Satan and Garibaldi." Birds of a feather are reported to flock together—the last evviva, this being the case, is very appropriate.—Catholic Review.

TO W. J. POTTER.

Potter, no longer trust the smooth-tongued sect
Which barters strength for polish, truth for taste,
But come away; and let us try to see
That way, high and perilous to ascend
Where almost all men say there is no road.
The world must have its gods like to itself;
And they who worship only one in form,
But half believe the triune fable still.
What rightful name have they to give or take?
Once from the Roman hill, Capitoline,
In clear, firm voice, none other like, you said,
"Albee, here you and I are under ban;
Not only here beneath these towers and domes,
Where Christ and Mary struggle for the shrines,
And fix their cheap and gaudy ensigns high
Upon the ancient gods' austere abodes,
But far away by famous Pilgrim Rock,
Boasted for liberty of word and act,
The same anathema confronts our faith."
Then come away; why quarrel with a lock
That closes you outside their prison walls?
Freedom there is for who will pay the price,
Th' applause of few or none, and silent thought.
Step from the altars, too magnificent,
And come with me where the long line of sea
Holds just one solitary sail; westward
Behold the pines that veil us from the world!

GLIMPSES.

The "Massachusetts Petition" foots up, in all, 2,301 names; the "Congressional Petition" foots up, in all, 1,569 names.

Do you contemplate buying books? Please examine the list of "Popular Books" on the second advertising page of The Index. By sending your orders to this office, you will not only find them promptly attended to, but also help the paper through these hard times.

The address of Mr. Horace Seaver at the meeting of the Boston Liberal League, of which a report will be found in another column, was not only radical and able, but good-humored and witty. He brought the house down when he represented the Church as sitting on a hill, and saying: "I am holier than you. I am the Great Exempted. Don't tax me!"

The recent "Encyclical Letter" of the Pope has forbidden the faithful to have any intercourse with unbelievers; and in consequence "Several Catholics of Crefeldt," Germany, have published a manifesto that hereafter they will cut all the Old Catholics of their acquaintance on the street—"or words to that effect." We fear some serious derangement of the solar system as a result of this merciless severity.

The Boston daily papers of Jan. 26 contained the following announcement; "The Speaker appointed, as the House members of the joint special committee on the subject of exemption of the property of religious and charitable institutions from taxation, Messrs. Kimball of Boston, Whiting of Pembroke, Morse of Newburyport, Lamb of Greenfield, Sanger of Danvers, Banister of Worcester, and Cole of Cheshire."

The Daily Advertiser of Jan. 24 has the following among its legislative notes: "Two petitions were presented in the House against allowing the Old South Church to sell its ancient estate. Both were from the venerable town of Deerfield, and one was headed by the Rev. Dr. Crawford, pastor of the Congregational church. The petition of the Boston Liberal League for a reform in the system of taxation was reënforced by another, signed by 1,150 persons."

The Boston Investigator has this cordial word, for which we return our sincere thanks: "Our neighbor of The Index is receiving large numbers of signatures to his petitions to the Legislature to tax Church Property. He is doing a good work, and may all the Liberals of Massachusetts lend him a helping hand, as also the Liberals of the Union in his petitions to Congress for the same purpose. Let the cry go forth everywhere—'The churches must be taxed like other corporations!'"

"Just think of it!" exclaims the Christian Statesman, commenting with exultation on Rev. Mr. Greene's Election Sermon to the Governor and Legislature of Massachusetts; "a body of legislators going for instruction, at the very beginning of their labors, to the ordinances of the Christian religion! Liberal Leagues and secularists generally, you must bestir yourselves. Here is the connection of Christianity and civil government in renewed vigor." Yes, so it is; and the Liberal League is "bestirring itself," in Boston at least. But there ought to be a wide-awake League in every town.

Signatures to the "Congressional Petition" against church-exemption have been received at this office as follows since last week: From the Banner of Light, Boston, 94 names; from D. P. Wilcox, Yankton, Dacotah Territory, 60; from John Galvin, South Boston, Mass., 35; from M. V. Sinz, Trent, Mich., 12; from C. M. A. Twitchell, Somerville, Mass., 14; from Mrs. F. A. Jordan, Battle Creek, Mich., 7 (in addition to her long list of last week); from H. B. Fletcher, West Boylston, Mass., 11; from O. S. Coffin, Humboldt, Kansas, 44; from R. M. Mansor, Houlton, Me., 82. Total for the week, 359 names.

Wendell Phillips has informed us that, since he is engaged to lecture every night till the middle of March, there is very little probability of his being able to address the proposed mass meeting in this city in protest against the continuance of church-exemption from taxation. "But," said Mr. Phillips, "I agree to the principle;" and he added that, if by any accident he should be released from his engagement on the night of the meeting, he would be present and address it. It is probable that, if we had the general control of the universe, he would find it as difficult to leave Boston that evening as the Spanish ram Arapiles found it to leave New York harbor.

Signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition" against church-exemption have been received at this office as follows since last week: From C. D. Story, Peabody, Mass., 150 names; from the Banner of Light, Boston, 145; from Charles Putnam, Lexington, 46; from Dr. M. E. Zakrzewska, Boston, 11; from John Galvin, South Boston, 36; from Geo. H. Foster, Boston, 16; from Abbot Walker, Salem, 44; from D. R. Bickford, Charlestown, 19; from C. M. A. Twitchell, Somerville, 14; from Alonzo Danforth, Boston, 45; from M. T. Dole, Boston, 14 (all heavy tax-payers); from Stephen Witt, Dana, 50; from H. B. Fletcher and Thos. Martin, West Boylston, 67; from A. C. Robinson, Lynn, 15; from J. P. Edson, Dighton, 7; from E. J. Young, Boston, 10; from Rev. J. H. Clifford, North Andover, 19; from James Dillaway, Somerville, 142; from Andrew Strickland, Randolph, 136; from Joseph E. Wiley, 149. Total number for the week, 1,167 names.

From the Border City Herald, of Fall River, Massachusetts, it appears that somebody is ambitious to forestall the "Congressional Petition" by "stealing the thunder" of it in this fashion: "In the United States House of Representatives, 6th inst., was presented the memorial of George Robertson and sixty-six other citizens of Fall River, Massachusetts, praying for the repeal of the first section of the act approved June 17, 1870, entitled 'An act exempting from taxes certain [church] property in the District of Columbia.'" Never mind! We think that said somebody is more enthusiastic than wise, because such a petition should be accompanied by a sufficient number of names to ensure it respectful consideration. It seems as if the liberals would never learn that "union is strength." But even precipitancy is better than indifferentism; and if Congress should repeal the obnoxious act in consequence of this not over courteous use of a paper which The Index sent out at the suggestion of the San José Liberal League, no one would rejoice more than we.

The Boston Liberal League is at work in earnest, as this extract from the Daily Advertiser of Jan. 23 plainly shows: "Mr. Kimball of Boston presented the petition of the Boston Liberal League for a law which shall secure just and equal taxation and abolish all exemptions. He moved its reference to a joint special committee of eight on the part of the House, with such as the Senate may join, and the motion was adopted. The speaker said he would take time to appoint the committee." On this the Advertiser remarks: "It is quite clear that the subject of the exemption of certain classes of property from taxation will be made one of the most important to come up this session, and a strong effort is to be made against the present system. A joint special committee on the question was ordered yesterday in the House, Mr. Kimball making the motion on offering a petition from the Boston Liberal League for the abolition of all exemptions. It will be remembered that an order was adopted some days ago for a committee to consider the expediency of taxing the property of religious and charitable corporations like any other, and of giving all State aid to such corporations in the form of direct grants. This, of course, will naturally go to the new committee." The movement in favor of equitable taxation is thus fairly brought before the Legislature, and in such a shape as to ensure its most favorable consideration. Now let all its friends redouble their exertions to get signatures to the petition, which will be added from time to time to the list of 1,150 already presented. Promptness is very desirable.

"TOLERATION" VS. THE EQUAL RIGHTS OF THOUGHT.

It is an insult to any man to say that we "tolerate" him or his opinions. If we have learned only to endure the expression of thought that is contrary to our own,—only to put up with it, as a nuisance we cannot get rid of,—only to listen to it with the appearance or the consciousness of according a great favor, as if it were a virtue in us not to gag the impertinent who dares to dispute the wisdom of our own opinion,—then we are abecedarians in the philosophy of freedom, and have yet to rise to a true comprehension of the equal rights of man. Not to feel and to evince a genuine reverence for all honest thought, no matter how much opposed it may be to our own most cherished convictions, is to fall into a grievous fault. If we "tolerate" others, they "tolerate" us; we have no more right to expect deference from others than they have to expect it from us; and the arrogation of superiority, the air of condescending sufferance, with which so-called liberals are too apt to receive the avowal of conclusions not identical with their own,—nay, the impudent assumption of infallibility which they sometimes unconsciously betray in the treatment of the otherwise-minded,—shows that free thought is not a principle, but merely an accident with them. Dr. Bastian punctured the conceit of more than one liberal when, referring to the supercilious manner in which Professor Huxley treated his patient experiments on spontaneous generation, he sarcastically alluded to the latter's "air of restrained omniscience."

Bigotry is more in the blood than in the brain. Shining examples can easily be found among Christian scholars of a spirit of unaffected liberality which would blush to be found criticising the results of other men except in the tone and temper of purely scientific impersonality; while too many instances occur of a stiff, conceited, and bullying arrogance on the part of those whose own principles pledge them to the utmost catholicity in the treatment of dissidents. The root of bigotry is found in the resting of conviction on anything but easily verifiable fact. To rest it on any divine revelation or any assumed personal superiority of insight makes bigotry almost inevitable; and while the former is the especial danger of Christians, the latter is the especial danger of free thinkers. There is but one sure escape from bigotry—the reference of all disputed questions to the tribunal of the universal reason of mankind. A too carefully cosseted individuality, an excessive reliance on the accuracy of private insight, is nearly as certain to produce bigotry as is a slavish faith in some divinely established standard of faith and practice. No matter how strong may be the conviction that we have found the exact truth, this conviction tends to beget bigotry if we fail to refer it for final authentication to the general intelligence of the race. Hence the scientific spirit, which always makes this reference, can alone protect us from the bigotry which underlies "toleration" almost as much as it underlies intolerance. The supreme appeal is indeed to private reason and conscience for the individual; he can never accept any overruling of their verdict so far as he himself is concerned. But to set up this subjective certainty on his own part as a law to all mankind,—to assume that every person who is not a knave or a fool must necessarily think as he thinks,—to take it for granted that the universal reason of mankind must conform to his own private reason, on peril of proving itself to be universal unreason,—this is bigotry undiluted, whether the bigot is called a Christian or a free thinker; and it is the general substratum of all pretences of "tolerating" differences of opinion. In fact, it is the commonest of all intellectual vices, and yields only to the corrective influence of the scientific spirit. Often a matter of temperament, it may resist the influence even of a so-called scientific education, and appear even in so-called scientific men, because the scientific world has not yet attained to a clear conception of the philosophy of science itself; but such men as Darwin and Gray show plainly enough what the true scientific spirit is, and what beautiful intellectual character it will create, when universally diffused. To such as these, bigotry is an impossibility; and we venture to say that the reverence they exhibit for the equal rights of thought is an infinitely nobler spectacle than the broadest "toleration" yet proclaimed by any Christian nation or institution. For no part of the Christian world has as yet got beyond "toleration;" and to tell a real Christian that a great deal more than "toleration" is demanded by humanity will bring to his face a stare of wonder, bewilderment, or even indignation.

Nevertheless, humanity does demand so much more than "toleration" that its demand is rather for a new principle than for the extension of an old one. Whoever "tolerates" another thereby assumes that he himself is infallibly right, while the other is wrong; and this assumption is bigotry, no matter on what grounds it is made. The Christian Church cannot, in the nature of things, go farther than to proclaim "universal toleration;" and even to go so far as this is to make a fatal inroad upon its own pretensions to be a divine institution. If it has the absolute truth, to believe which is the sacred duty of all men, to tolerate difference of opinion is to tolerate sinful error; and to tolerate sinful error is itself to sin. Hence the Catholic Church has only followed out faithfully its own fundamental principle in persecuting unbelievers and suppressing unbelief at all costs; it will do it again, if it ever regains the power of doing it; and when Protestant countries have gone so far as to proclaim simple "toleration" for unbelief, they have gone far enough to imperil and contradict the Christianity they profess still to defend. In this country, however, for the first time in Christendom, a great nation has planted itself, not on "universal toleration," but on the equal rights of thought. The United States Constitution ignores Christianity, and puts every man on a religious equality with every other man; and although its present guarantees of this religious equality are still imperfect, the great principle on which our whole political structure rests is the principle that no man and no body of men shall assume to "tolerate" the exercise of the equal rights of thought, of speech, of action. Glorious indeed shall be the future of any people that is faithful to that sublime idea!

HOW COULD WE HELP IT?

It happened, some time ago, that several of us, after studying carefully the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures, in the original languages, with the aid of learned and pious teachers, and of approved commentaries, were brought to the conclusion that Jesus Christ was a man. That he was a most noble and beautiful soul, ardently desirous to do good,—this was beyond question; but he seemed to be entangled in a Messianic delusion, which all his national traditions and associations encouraged, and which utterly failed of fulfilment in the sense he apparently expected, though it was in part ultimately fulfilled, in another and a higher sense. It is not now necessary to dwell farther on this; the point is that some of us came to believe it. We had "searched the Scriptures" honestly, prayerfully, patiently, conscientiously; we were persons of varied gifts, tastes, and temperaments, and so apt to differ about other matters, yet we alike came to this honest conclusion. The question is—How could we help it?

We were perhaps as modest as the average of young men. We were told to wait—to gain experience; we were assured that time would make us think differently. We waited, some longer, some not so long. That time never came. Then we were taunted with not expressing our opinions. Then we frankly expressed them; and were reproached for doing it. But how could we help it?

These opinions seemed at first to put us in a minority; and they have, with almost every one, been a serious obstacle in those paths of fortune, fame, and popularity which sometimes prove attractive to youth. Yet we found the demand constantly made upon us that we should do as much to urge forward our opinions as do those who have money, leisure, and reputation. Indeed we made this demand upon ourselves, and so began to propagate our opinions actively. How could we help it?

Then it was pointed out by our opponents—and indeed we had early said it to ourselves—that we had no right to call ourselves "Christian," if we held Jesus Christ to be a man. Yet when we disclaimed the name "Christian"—though it would have been more easy, more popular, more everything but honest, to retain it,—our kind advisers were no better satisfied. Yet they have never told us how we could logically help it.

Though all this time we had always been reproached with extreme individualism, and a foolish desire to be alone. By-and-by, as we increased in numbers and in mutual knowledge, we said, "Very well, we will not stand alone; we will form associations." So we formed a Free Religious Association, and worked together, inviting in all, whatever their opinions, who would work for religious freedom, both outside and inside of all established creeds. We also formed an association and published a newspaper, and tracts, and all the rest. It cost us a good deal of time and money and energy, but we did it. Those who had reproved us for acting singly did not seem to like it any better when we came together, and worked as they worked. But how could we help it?

In this gradual way, step by step, have the Free Religious Association and THE INDEX newspaper come into being. I fail to see a flaw in the process, at any step; nor do I see a point at which we could have logically stopped and said, "No farther." And the criticisms of our opponents have at each point vindicated our action; for they have always begun by reproving us for not doing precisely the thing which we afterwards did. Thus it is that we have gone on; until the "we" has at last become a much more numerous "we" than at the beginning. For this we are naturally glad. How can we help it? T. W. H.

CHURCH AND STATE.

It is always interesting to watch the different treatment given to a great subject by minds of opposite tendencies, especially when they arrive at similar results.

Recently THE INDEX printed the very clear and able discourse of Mr. Abbot on "Church and State," in which he treats the subject on historical grounds, and shows the Christian Church to have been true to its original idea, and therefore antagonistic to a free State. He considers the contest an irreconcilable one,—only to be ended by the defeat of one party or the other; and, taking his stand for the free State against the authoritative Church, he proposes measures of offence and defence against the latter, prominent among which is the repeal of all special privileges to the Christian Church, such as the exemption from taxation, &c.

Almost simultaneously appears in the St. Louis Daily Globe a full report of a lecture by Mr. William T. Harris, the well-known leader of speculative philosophy, in which he treats the same subject in his own characteristic manner, and arrives at the same practical conclusion respecting taxation that Mr. Abbot does.

Mr. Harris accepts a Church as the true representative of the spiritual side of man, "founded for the purpose of realizing in man a reflection of the divine ideal, to the end that he may be elevated to a mystic union with the Absolute Person." The State, on the contrary, is founded to "secure man's freedom in time and space." He therefore finds an antagonism between the State and the Church, and considers that, historically, each has attempted to control the other unduly. He believes that this antagonism, however, is a reconcilable one, and that a purely spiritual Church and a true free State can mutually aid each other, if each recognizes the other's function and does not tyrannize over it. He recognizes the Christian as the highest development of the religious idea, proclaiming its central principle as the "incarnation of the divine," but makes no mention of the special form of this idea in a historic person.

He says: "It is obvious that the Christian religion could not exist perfectly in a State founded on an idea not in harmony with it. Only where the State is founded fully on the Christian idea can religion and the State be sundered as existing institutions." "In the progress of civilization, the secular becomes independent of the religious act, not in the sense that it alone is sufficient for man, but only in the sense that the secular is capable of directing its sphere in harmony with religion, and consequently does not need the interference or guidance of the latter."

From these principles, of which brief extracts give only the dry skeleton, he deduces the necessity of "a complete separation of the Church from all and every secular institution. This being accomplished, the individuals composing the Church enter freely into all secular relations, and the Church itself stands side by side with secular institutions. The $354,000,000 of property held in the Church will then be taxed like other property!"

This relation he considers as beneficial to the Church as to the State. "Its empire will then be more distinctly felt to be the empire wherein alone is to be found the truest and highest freedom."

He closes with this admirable sentence: "Human life is worth the living solely by reason of the great ideas that uphold it and cherish it. The institution which holds up for man the absolute ideal will first become fully conscious of its power in the world when it resigns all adventitious aid, and makes its work of revealing the Divine to the heart and reason of man its sole claim on the support of mankind."

Literary Notices.

THE ALCHEMY OF HAPPINESS. By Mohammed Al-Ghazzali, the Mohammedan Philosopher. Translated from the Turkish, by Henry A. Homes, Librarian of the State Library. Albany, N. Y.: J. Munsell, State Street. 1873.

It is interesting to find in different ages, among various races, and under diverse forms of religious belief, the same yearning and thirsting of the human spirit for the Divine, the Infinite. An element implanted so deeply and so universally in the soul would seem an almost satisfactory evidence, of itself alone, that there is that in existence which is adapted to satisfy this craving, to fulfil this longing. But be this as it may, how beautifully the recognition of this fact tends to fraternize each with all—Buddhist and Jew, Mohammedan and Christian, here meeting at one common centre, and finding that the highest aspirations of each blend and harmonize in that which is most interior and precious. And how evident it seems that this common sentiment forms the basis of a universal religion, too grand to be limited by the minor peculiarities of any one form of faith, however pure and exalted; in its essence embracing the true vitality of each, yet free as the air of heaven, and all-pervading as the spirit of the universe. It seems, indeed, wonderful that all persons of earnest thought and of religious genius should not so regard it; that, either through the force of traditional teachings received along with their earliest physical nutriment, or through unconscious prejudices in favor of once established beliefs, they should persist in claiming for a part the entirety of the whole, and, arrogantly, as it would seem, setting up the pretensions of that into which they happened to have been born as superior to the universal, and that to which all others must surrender. In Christians, this tendency seems the more striking and surprising in proportion to their enlightenment and their breadth of vision. A fetter seems to lie upon the minds of such which prevents a hospitable reception of the idea of an unlimited religion, embracing all that is most divine in connection with the spirit of Christianity, and which is identical with the noblest and best in other religions. Let the name given to this be what it may, Free Religion, Natural Religion, or RELIGION in the abstract, it matters not; an entirely free range of thought, and a perfectly just philosophy would seem necessarily to result in taking a stand on this uncircumscribed basis.

One cannot but be thrilled with admiration for the spirit of the author of the Alchemy of Happiness. Philosophizing from the premises on which he starts, a burning desire for imparting what he believes to be truth seems to pervade his whole being. His heart goes forth in tenderness and love towards those whom he seeks to instruct, and he recognizes in them a thirst for the knowledge he has to give. The first words of his work are, "O seeker after the divine mysteries!" And this address he reiterates, in the same or varied form, on almost every page; as "O seeker of the way!" "O seeker of knowledge!" "O student of wisdom!" and thus seems to exhaust all the terms indicative of earnestness for the truth, and often interspersed with the touching expressions, "Besides, beloved," "Know then, beloved," showing the tender affiliation of his spirit with those whom he wishes to help in their search after wisdom.

From the "Introduction" to the work, it is found that Mohammed Al-Ghazzali was an Arabian philosopher of the eleventh century, that he was educated a Mohammedan, but during a portion of his life was harassed with doubts, and at times was an absolute sceptic; and that, anxiously desiring to know what is truth, he at length settled upon a life of monastic study and devotion, and consecrated himself to writing the results of his meditations. He is said to be held in so high respect by Mohammedan scholars of the present day that they never mention him without some such epithet as the "Scientific Imaum," or "Chief witness of Islamism." It is stated that in histories of philosophy his name has been given with those of Averroes and Avicenna, as showing the intellectual life and the philosophical schools of the Mohammedans, and that Lewes makes him the typical figure to represent Arabian philosophy.

The topics treated of in this work are "Knowledge of the Soul," "Knowledge of God," "Knowledge of the World," "Knowledge of the Future World," and "The Love of God." By the "Alchemy of Happiness" he means the knowledge, obedience and worship of God. The knowledge of one's own soul he regards as the key to the knowledge of God. He believes in direct inspiration, and says the state necessary to it may be acquired by abandoning the use of the external senses, by having the heart pure, and calling out, "O God! O God!" as thus the supplicant comes into harmony with the invisible world. He asserts for man a preëxistent state of purity, but says this is dimmed or lost by connection with the material, yet to some it is given to recover this while still in the body, and to such the spiritual world is anew revealed. No man, he says, can understand what transcends his own nature, so none but God can comprehend God. God's control over the universe he illustrates by man's control over his own body. He discourses fervently upon the love of God, says "it exists in every heart, though it lies concealed, just as fire exists in the flint-stone until it is drawn out." "The love we bear to persons," he says, "is not from any hope of gain, but because the spirits of men are created in correspondence with the character of God." The catholicity of his spirit is admirable. "On the resurrection day," he writes, "all sects will be addressed by the name of the prophet whom each followed, 'O people of Moses! O people of Jesus! O people of Mohammed!' even to all the servants of God, and it will be proclaimed to them, 'O friends and beloved of God, come to the blessed union and society of God! Come to Paradise and partake of the grace of your beloved!" Ghazzali was, of course, ignorant of the truths of modern science, but he philosophizes deeply from his own data. He received discoveries in science which he considered established by proofs, even if they were opposed to the Koran. He manifests a most devout spirit throughout the work, saying often he will do so or so, "if it please God." Not the most devoted Christian could more earnestly enforce renunciation of the world, and a life of purity, looking to the future for reward and happiness. A. H.

WHO OWNS THE HARVEST?

EDITOR INDEX:—

In your reply to "The Wickedness of Profits," on page 521 of THE INDEX of Dec. 18, 1873, when you say of your "John Smith," who accepts only about half that Nature gives him for tilling the soil, that he "is evidently a very queer and unreasonable fellow in all this,"—I fully agree with you; and since you ask, "What shall we say to him nevertheless?" by your kind permission I would suggest that this whole difficulty arises from the false value placed on the corn and labor. In this he follows the practice in trade, instead of learning from Nature that the whole crop in excess of the seed is the wages of Nature given him for personally protecting and guiding her energy, and is in no sense "profit and interest" on capital invested, nor "natural wealth free to all," belonging "as much to Peter as to himself," since the crop did not grow "spontaneously out of the earth." Then according to the law of property, which Mr. Abbot tries to overthrow, by applying it to Smith's case, we find that "John Smith" is the rightful owner of the whole crop. This fact does not, however, make of him a "grasping capitalist, exacting a profit." This depends on the price that he is willing to take for it in sale or trade, which, we hold, should be the amount of energy or sacrifice it has cost him.

This brings me to the consideration of Mr. Walker's able article headed "The Reproductiveness of Capital," on the same page of THE INDEX. Although some of his points, I think, are the strongest that have appeared in your paper in defence of profits and interest, they are condemned by their author, in his proof that the Creator "does not approve" of "overgrown estates," and when he says that he is "not in favor of the capitalist," and that "the self-augmenting power of accumulated capital is absolutely frightful, and must in some way be checked." I still hold that "interest-taking" is unjust. I will try to show that Mr. Walker's "young millionaire" is unjust in his demands upon the users of his tools, since he claims for the tools their value increased by the energy of the users, whereas he can justly claim only an amount of energy equal to that which the tools cost him. This is all that he would have had if he had not exchanged his energy through the tools.

Any increase over the cost value of articles exchanged, arising from the use of them by others, builds up the strong at the expense of the weak, and destroys the general welfare. To arrest this glaring and monstrous injustice, it will be necessary to abolish profits and interest, the true causes of these evil effects. This will not, however, abolish "the natural inequalities of men," but limit all income to actual productive capacity, making producers of all, and thus permit society to progress as a whole, and not, like Mr. Walker's existing system, enable one class of society to live at the expense of the other.

But to establish justice in trade, the truth must be sought, and diffused through agitation and free discussion, and applied by coöperative and individual effort; and for this object I am yours again,

Respectfully,

WM. L. HEBERLING.

ATALISSA, Iowa, Jan. 6, 1874.

[Mr. Heberling blames the man who claims, for the tools he sells, "their value increased by the energy of the users." Let him apply the same rule to the case of John Smith, in his relation to Nature. John plants five bushels of corn, and Mr. Heberling says ninety-five out of the whole crop of (say) one hundred bushels belongs to him by natural right, as the "wages of Nature given him for personally protecting and guiding her energy." Now these ninety-five bushels are the result of Nature's energy, not of John's; they belong to Nature, not to John; and Mr. Heberling cannot make them John's without the fiction that Nature pays them to him as "wages" for services rendered. But what benefit has John conferred on Nature, that he should claim from her such monstrous wages? Is she any better off because of his labor? He has rendered to her no equivalent whatever, and has no right to these ninety-five bushels except as the interest on his invested capital. If Nature gives them at all, she gives them to humanity, not to John; she cares nothing for his false individual claims; and if John goes upon the "cost principle," he will in consistency hold that the whole crop is not his, but that a large part of it is as much Peter's property as his own. In a word, he will refuse to accept the value of his seed "increased by the energy of the user," i.e. Nature, and regard this increase as the common property of mankind. The only way to vindicate his right to the whole crop is to concede the rightfulness of taking interest on capital invested. So long as he gets back from Nature more than he gives up to her, and thus does not make an equal exchange of values, he will find it impossible on the "cost principle" to show that he has not appropriated to his own uses what every other man has an equally just claim to. A quantity of corn equal to what he planted, plus a quantity of corn exactly equal to the value of his time and labor, is all that the "cost principle" will allow to be justly his; and the rest is the common wealth of mankind, free to all. Let us be true to whatever principle we adopt; if Mr. Heberling's is sound, let him not flinch from its logical consequences.—ED.]

FREE RELIGION AND REFORM.

EDITOR INDEX:—

I perused with great interest the article in your issue of November 6, by "O. B. F.," under the caption of "Precept upon Precept," in which he enters a disclaimer on behalf of the Free Religious Association of any existing connection with social reforms, and saying that this sort of business "had better be the soonest possible taken out of the hands of associations professing a religious aim," as they have so uniformly bungled it. That they have uniformly mixed and muddled this question, I freely admit; but no more so than they have their theology. Who can make anything out of that? Take foreordination, man's free moral agency, accountability, election, and the atonement; they not only get inextricably tangled themselves, but they make their God out a first-class bungler. I claim that it is not fair to measure the possibilities of free religion, or mental freedom, by any partial, limited, or cramped standard. If I do not misunderstand the desire of all true liberals, it is to elevate humanity to the highest possible position; and it strikes me that the social question underlies the whole question of progress, and that all advancement must be dependent, and wait upon, the proper development of social reform. I cannot understand why it is that nearly, if not quite, all of our professed reformers beg this social question the way they do. Is there not reason enough why it should be discussed and agitated? Is it possible that society could be in a much worse condition than it is at present? Statistics show that one-half of the children die before reaching the age of five years; this fact alone should be sufficient to engage the best intellect in the world to seek out the cause and prescribe a remedy. Should the same rate of mortality obtain among our domestic animals, or anything approaching this percentage, it would raise a commotion from one side of the world to the other, and the resources of science would be exhausted in solving the problem. There is, however, no necessity for a scientific commission on this question for some time to come, and it will be soon enough to make a complex question of social reform when sufficient progress has been made to exhaust what practical knowledge already exists upon the subject. We ask first that equal care, judgment, and responsibility be displayed in the reproduction of the species that is exhibited by any stock-raiser, farmer, or gentleman, who desires to possess the "perfect horse" or other animal. No pains or expense is spared by them to obtain the most desirable stock; they are particular to examine the pedigree, ascertain that all the qualities desirable are combined, so that they may be reasonably sure of producing something superior to what has already developed. So it is with all the domestic animals that minister to our necessities, convenience, comfort, or fancy. The lesson does not end here. During the ante-natal period of the beast, the greatest care and discretion are exercised so that overwork, over-exertion, or other causes, may not endanger or impoverish the offspring. All the conditions requisite for the production of a perfect representative of its species are complied with; and what is the result? A constant improvement in the good qualities of all our domestic animals, while humanity appears to be going the other way. The reason why our social reformers fail to accomplish any desirable results is simply this: they try to cure by doctoring the symptoms rather than the cause of the disease. It is a sad, a deplorable condition of society, when humanity sinks in importance below the brute creation, —when this habitation of what we believe to be a portion of divine intelligence becomes of less consequence than the beast of the field. Pray tell me, if you can, why this all-important question is so completely tabooed by people who profess so much solicitude for the welfare of humanity? Can any one fail to see that the race is generated regardless of any desire to comply with the conditions essential to a healthy physical or mental organism? Who cannot see the immense improvement that would result from the application even of the same prerequisite considered so indispensable in the generation of our domestic animals.

This appears to me to be a question of the utmost importance, and one which properly comes within the province of all societies that essay to improve and elevate humanity. "O. B. F." says this social question should be treated scientifically, with knowledge; which simply means that truth or "organized common sense" should solve and govern its development. True; but long and rapid strides may be made, and great benefits be visible, before the science or common sense already available upon the subject shall be exhausted. Then it will be time enough to number stirpculture among the sciences; and it will be deemed the most important of any that shall engage the attention of the world.

We cannot reasonably hope for great improvement in the social or mental condition of humanity until some consideration is bestowed upon the ante-natal period of our existence. Should we continue to progress in this direction in the same ratio that we have been doing, and make corresponding improvement in our domestic animals, I fear we shall find ourselves where there could be no doubt of Darwin's or Spencer's theories of evolution. We need to-day a society for the prevention of cruelty to human beings more than we do Bergh's society. One cannot fail to perceive that all reforms would be much more potent for good, did they extend their efforts to the encouragement of the observance of certain laws known to be indispensable to the production of physically and mentally healthy offspring. If we really desire the disenthrallment and elevation of the race, we must not hesitate to discuss this social question with that earnestness and freedom which shall carry conviction, and make the science of stirpculture as popular a science and study as agriculture or horticulture. Then will there be the marked improvement that has been so unsuccessfully sought after by those who profess to have this cause so much at heart. Then, and then only, will these social evils disappear from our midst. It will be found to be much more desirable and practicable to keep "natural cussedness" out of society than it will be to extract it after it has once firmly taken root. Of course, those who believe mankind to be depraved by nature would regard this new science as an interference with the divine plan, and discountenance its application at once; yet the same ones are every day virtually telling the Almighty that he did not know how to make a horse, a cow, or even a black-and-tan dog, as well as they can; and they are continually improving upon the original creation. Yet the noblest creation of all that we are cognizant of must continue to wallow in the mire of ignorance for the sole reason that—

"In Adam's sin
We all jined in."

Very truly yours, J. T. C.

AMESBURY, Mass.

[In the original Prospectus of THE INDEX it was said: "Without limiting itself to any of the great reformatory movements of the time, it proposes to work for them all in the most efficient way by fostering the spirit of reform, and by uprooting every conservative prejudice by which reform is checked." This purpose has never been lost sight of. Free Religion is nothing but the earnest application of the total energies of man to the task of perfecting his whole nature and condition; and it is the fertilizer of social reforms in all their manifold shapes. We do not believe that Mr. Frothingham intended to say anything at all inconsistent with this. But it is true that the great work of Free Religion to-day consists rather in removing the obstructions to all reform than in devoting itself exclusively, or even mainly, to any one branch of reform. Get rid of mental and spiritual slavery, and then the conditions are ripe for improving society in every conceivable way. It takes a large, clear intelligence to discern and appreciate the superior importance of this general work, as compared with the various special movements of philanthropy and social science. But Free Religion is a failure, total and complete, if it means indifference to any wise reform.—ED.]

SUBSOILING.

"Plough deep, while sluggards sleep;
And you shall have corn to sell and to keep."

So saith Poor Richard, scarcely expecting the triumphs of modern agriculture, which makes many an apparently worn-out farm productive, simply by bringing up to the surface fresh soil from below.

Modern theology is fertilizing, by the same process, the seemingly exhausted field of religious experience. The one-horse ploughs of the old sects were ceasing to stir the ground with profit, when Transcendentalism added a second horse and substituted a heavier plough. What rich soil has since been turned up, every reader of Carlyle, Emerson, and Parker remembers gratefully. But we shall get still richer ground, as the subsoil plough comes into the field, and follows after our two-horse one, in the same furrow, from the bottom of which it lifts up to the surface the fresh, virgin earth, ready to bear better crops than ever blessed the earth before. The good, old trees will grow all the better for this wholesome pruning of their roots, but woe to the weeds! This lifting subsoiler is drawn by the physical sciences, and Mental Science holds it firm and true. It seems to undo, but really completes, the work of Transcendentalism.

Never have I seen this subsoiling so thoroughly done as recently before the Radical Club, under the wise hands of one who is all the dearer to us since he has been excluded from clerical fellowship, for no alleged lack of faith but only of phraseology, no deficiency in his vocation but merely in his vocabulary, —just as Cordelia was disinherited for not saying exactly what King Lear demanded.

This essayist, after contrasting the Orthodox view, that moral and religious truth was miraculously intrusted to gifted men in the past, that they might hand it down authoritatively, with the Transcendental view, that such truth is immediately revealed to all living men and women, in conscience and intuition—the one view making revelation continuous but not universal, the other universal but not continuous,—proceeded to show that revelation is both continuous and universal, coming by general laws, which favor no individuals exclusively, but which teach every generation through the knowledge of its predecessors. As the lower animals were developed into the first men and women, these came into possession of moral and religious knowledge, as a natural concomitant of their new position; and as the earlier races expanded into higher ones, this knowledge was not only retained but continually enlarged. Inspiration is thus the inheritance of all our race, and an inheritance of ever-increasing value. This transmission is not by arbitrary authority, but by natural necessity. Our best knowledge is worth all the more, because it was known to the good and wise before us, in such power as to gravitate into the frame-work of our own ideas.

Not rashly, therefore, should any one set up a special revelation of his own at variance with this universal one, which never recedes but goes on forever.

But the essay is not one to bear abridgment. Indeed, what has just been said might rather be called suggested by it than selected from it, and is brought forward to introduce some further ideas, which were insisted upon by critics of the essay as necessary to the full truth, and which may here be stated thus.

In stating them I may, indeed, seem to quit the firm earth of knowledge for the unstable ocean of belief; but such an embarkation on the sea is often necessary in order to see "the lay of the land."

We all feel so sure that we have in us something besides our inherited emotions, ideas, and faculties of feeling and thought, some private property, besides our share of the general inheritance, something personal, peculiar, and characteristic of our own individual self, that I feel warranted in believing that all which we inherit is only a receptacle, into which flows the fitting portion of that Universal Force which is ever present, but which manifests itself only as it finds its field.

The light shows colors according to the formation of the various surfaces on which it falls, and Whittier tells us how—

> "The clear, white light, tradition-colored, stole,
> Through the stained oriel of each human soul."

So when the laws of physiological growth and mental inheritance bring a child into the world, the law of action of the Universal Force gives him such part of itself as joins with his inherited traits and capacities to form his soul. As we call this Universal Force God, so we call ourselves sons and daughters of God, as well as "heirs of all the ages." The past is our mother, and our father is God indeed. The Bible story of the incarnation is false only in its limitation. In every man and woman the spirit is made flesh. To all our race belongs the name Emmanuel, God with us.

And we go so far because we can go farther still. We cannot, indeed, contradict or disparage what we know by inheritance, in virtue of any alleged acquisitions through our divine sonship, for that inheritance is itself a lesson taught us by the God of truth. All his teaching is in harmony, but as we acknowledge how completely it possesses us, we may have faith that God dwelleth in us. He is the Water of Life which fills to the brim the vase of inherited capacities and peculiarities. Useless the vase without the water; impossible for any one to possess the water without holding fast the vase. That this Water of Life survives the dying body, I consider certain; that the vase survives also seems probable, but I do not ask whether it will survive forever, and so hold that portion of the water eternally separate, or whether the vase will eventually crumble, and the spiritual ocean finally become one perfect and undivided whole. It matters little what we shall be in comparison with what we are. And that is best told in the story of how the Sufi saint entered Paradise:—

> "Said God, 'Who seeks to enter here?'
> 'Tis I, dear Friend,' the saint replied,
> And trembled much through hope and fear.
> 'If it be thou, without abide.'"

The saint goes back to earth, and, having at last risen above hope and fear into perfect love, knocks once more at the heavenly gate:—

> "Asked God, 'Who now is at the door?'
> 'It is thyself, beloved Lord!'
> Answered the saint, in doubt no more,
> But clasped and rapt in his reward."

THE "YOUNG CHRISTIANS" DISCUSSING CHRISTIANITY.

"Resolved: That Christianity has now a stronger hold than ever upon the people, scepticism to the contrary notwithstanding."

It was a feeling of more than ordinary curiosity that impelled me to visit the pleasant rooms of the Boston Young Men's Christian Association a few evenings since, having been informed that the above resolution—in substance at least—was to be made the subject of open discussion. I have concluded to report, as best I can from memory, some of the arguments made, thinking they may perhaps interest others as they certainly interested me. I may not give the speakers' remarks in the same order as they were given, but nothing will be written that was not actually said in substance as here reported.

The debate was opened in the affirmative by a gentleman of good rhetorical powers, and evidently of broad and generous sympathies. He was a good representative of those who think that the fullest mental freedom is not incompatible with Christianity, but whose personal loyalty to freedom and humanity is unquestionable.

He began with an elaborate defence of free speech. He thought that at no time in our history was liberty of speech more fully accorded than now, and it was due in great part to Christian teaching. Wherever the opinions of John Calvin had obtained a foothold, freedom had been the fruit. He hoped full liberty of expression would be accorded to all, of whatever opinions, this evening. Should there be an "infidel" present, who dissented from the most of us, he desired that he should have a respectful hearing; for if we allowed no one to question our opinions, how should we know them to be true? The essence of Christianity was the Golden Rule, and the universal recognition of its truth and beauty was evidence of the strength of Christianity. The "infidels" claim that this maxim was taught first by Confucius several centuries before Christ, but they forget that Jesus was the first to reduce it to practice. "Infidelity" is now altogether better than in the last century. The Free Religious organization contained a larger proportion of men of intellect than any other organization in the country, but they ought not to stand outside of Christianity.

The chairman took the floor. He would speak in the negative, though he did not take that side as representing his own views. He was disappointed that the opener did not speak to the question, but seemed to avoid it, and spent his time in arguing the right of free discussion, which in most cases he (the speaker) would approve. But it was not that right, nor Confucius, nor Socrates, that we were to discuss, but rather the question whether Christianity has or has not a strong hold upon the people to-day.

Let us look about us; let us go into the country, to the Berkshire hills, if you please, on a Sabbath, and see the people rambling through the woods and climbing the mountains. Compare this with fifty or an hundred years ago. Then the sanctity of the Sabbath was preserved, and the house of God well filled, where now it is nearly deserted and falling to decay. Look nearer home, in our own city. Look at Beacon Hill with all its wealth and culture, and compare it with its Christian inhabitants of even fifty years ago. Then look abroad. It is true that the Church of Rome is being shaken in Italy, in Spain, in Austria, and France; but it is being replaced, not by Christianity, but by "infidelity." These were undeniable facts.

A speaker in the affirmative differed from the last speaker; had good authority for saying that in Austria a good Protestant work was being done. In Germany the cause of Christ was progressing. Of two principal schools, one of which represented Christianity and the other "infidelity," the former was full, while the other was nearly deserted. A great missionary work was also being accomplished.

The first speaker wished to introduce a friend who would take the negative. This gentleman said he had come at the invitation of his friend, from whom he felt compelled to dissent, as he thought he had not properly defined Christianity. From what the opening speaker had said, the idea was conveyed that Christianity consisted in the observance of the Golden Rule; in which case he would admit that Christianity might have a strong hold upon the people. But a man might be moral without being a Christian. He thought Christianity impossible without faith in Christ. Christianity required faith in the atoning blood of Christ as essential to salvation. Now had this faith as strong a hold upon the people as formerly? He thought not. One could see signs to the contrary everywhere. One great indicator was the character of the prevalent literature. Scientific publications are increasing, and we find a scientific department in most of the periodicals. Darwinism, that most unchristian doctrine, seemed to have taken hold of the minds of most scientific men, and even those who professed to be Christians. He could not see how Christians could hold such a doctrine. If man was developed from lower forms of life, instead of having fallen from a high and perfect state,—if there was no Adam and no "fall,"—then there was no atonement, no salvation through Christ. He was surprised to see that in the Evangelical Alliance, where steadfastness to Christ was to be expected, some of the ablest men, like Dr. McCosh and Prof. Brown, conceded that there is truth in such a theory. Most of Dr. McCosh's essay was devoted to showing that Darwinism did not disprove the existence of God. Was Christianity gaining or losing strength when such essays were necessary? Could we have Christianity without Christ and the Bible? Again, "infidel" publications were increasing; and he understood that there had been crowded attendance at the "infidel" meetings at Horticultural Hall lately. Moreover, there was an organized movement to place "infidels" on a political equality with Christians. He found some professing Christians favoring it, some of them arguing that Jesus, when he said, "Ye are all brethren together," meant all human beings; when he evidently had only meant this saying to apply to believers.

A gentleman in the affirmative thought Christianity had triumphed in the past, and would triumph in the future. It had civilized the world, and overthrown empires. When we study Christianity, we should not take the New Testament alone, but the whole Bible. Judaism was the ancient Christianity. Compare the Holy Land with what it was before the hosts of Israel entered it. Remember what a wicked people they found there, barbarians, with no books, no literature, no arts, no sciences! Christianity had always progressed. That which was good was permanent; Christianity could not die.

A gentleman rose in the negative. He was himself a Christian; but when he viewed Christianity as Christ taught it, he felt compelled to think it had not as strong a hold upon the people as formerly. Jesus defined Christianity, and told what should be the signs of belief. In his name they should cast out devils, handle venomous reptiles, and drink poison without harm. In the early days of Christianity these things were done, for it then had a strong hold upon the followers of Christ. Did people now sell all they had, and give to the poor? When smitten on one cheek, did they turn the other also? When their coat was taken, was the cloak forthcoming? Did the rich Christian "lend to him that asketh"? No, he sat in his richly cushioned pew, and tried to get salvation some other way. Who had authority thus to set aside the teachings of Christ? Progress in the arts and sciences was independent of Christianity. The city of Paris had developed the art of architecture greatly, but it could not be called a Christian city. In no country were the sciences so studied as in Germany, but it was a land of rationalists and unbelievers. His friend was unfortunate in his allusion to Palestine. The Mussulman counted his harem in the very seat of Christianity, of which he was the sole possessor except a few wailing Jews and wandering Bedouin Arabs.

A gentleman in the affirmative thought we had no right to judge a man's Christianity because he sat in a cushioned pew at church. He thought a Christian was one who believed the Bible and the teachings of Christ. He did not believe Jesus ever taught that all men were brothers. Jesus was talking to his disciples when he said that, and referred to them only. He (the speaker) could not call an "infidel" brother. Christianity was the cause of all our civilization; it had a strong hold of the people.

A gentleman took the floor in the negative. He said he had been opposed to having this question discussed, as he felt that he should have to take the negative. One of his reasons for thinking that Christianity had not so strong a hold had been given by the gentleman who referred to the Evangelical Alliance. He too had taken interest in the doings of that organization, but must confess he was greatly disappointed. There was but little hope of Christianizing the world. He was aware of the good work reported by missionaries, but failed to find between the lids of his Bible any promise that the whole world would ever be converted. He knew that others thought differently, but it did not satisfy him.

Several speakers in the affirmative spoke of the beneficent effects of Christianity, the increase of the Church, the number of heathen converts, and the impossibility of civilization without it.

A gentleman in the negative thought the advance in science and civilization had nothing to do with Christianity. There was no denying the fact that the power of Christianity lay more in its moral than in its intellectual force.

The gentleman introduced by the opener wished to say a few words more. He had been pleased with the discussion, but was sorry it had not been confined more strictly to the question. It might be interesting to talk of the value of Christianity, but it was not the question at issue. Nor did it answer to show that the number of nominal Christians is increasing. What we wished to decide was whether CHRISTIAN IDEAS had as strong a hold upon the people as formerly, or not. It was possible for the number of professing Christians to increase, and for Christian faith at the same time to be on the decline. He had defined Christianity as "faith in Christ," and no one had dissented from the definition. We wished to know if Christians are true to Christ. He was surprised that the speaker who agreed with him that no Christian could recognize an "infidel" as brother should take the affirmative. It seemed that there was an evident tendency on the part of Christians to be lax in this matter. He was present at a conversation a few evenings since among several persons, all churchmembers in evangelical denominations; and when one of them advocated, as a Christian duty, the exclusion of "infidels" from the jury box and all offices of trust and profit in the State, none of the others fully endorsed it. He could only account for it by a conscious weakness of Christian faith.

The argument was closed by the first speaker in the affirmative. He had been very much interested in the discussion, and would not attempt to refer to all that had been said. The speaker who had followed him had thought there was a decline in Christianity because people in the country, unlike their ancestors, preferred exercise in the open air to going to church. The reason for that was plain. Under the influence of Christianity the masses had improved so much that the clergy and laity stood on more of an intellectual equality than their fathers did, and did not value pulpit instruction so highly on that account. If the clergy wished to retain their influence, they must pay more attention to their intellectual culture. He did not agree with all that had been said to be the duty of Christians, but thought we should be charitable to opponents, and carry out the principles of fair play, as taught by John Stuart Mill in his admirable essay on Liberty, which was Christian teaching, notwithstanding people in their ignorance called Mr. Mill "infidel."

A GERMAN peddler sold a man a liquid for extermination of bugs. "And how do you use it?" inquired the man, after he had bought it. "Ketch te bug, un drop von little drop into his mout," answered the peddler. "Pshaw!" exclaimed the purchaser, "I could kill it in half the time by stamping on it." "Vell," calmly explained the German, "dat is a good way, too."—National Baptist.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. THE INDEX,

REAL ESTATE SECURITIES, paying 8 to 10 per cent. interest, or

Investments in Real Estate in Chicago and vicinity, if judiciously made, are the best and safest modes of employing capital. The old

Real Estate and Loan Agency

OF

ERNST PRUSSING, 143 RANDOLPH STREET,

Chicago (Established 1853),

Guarantees perfect title and ample security in all its Real Estate Loans.

Firstclass securities always on hand. Interest and principal collected without charge. Real Estate Investments made on commission and on shares; taxes paid, &c.

Orders of capitalists and real estate owners respectfully solicited.

THE ATTENTION

of capitalists is directed to the card of G. L. Henderson & Co., Bankers, at Leroy, Minn. We have personally known Messrs. Henderson for a period of thirteen years, and the firm of G. L. Henderson & Co. since its organization, and can therefore recommend it as in every way trustworthy and responsible. Leroy is situated in the midst of a country of wonderful fertility, where a single crop frequently pays for a good farm and expenses of cultivation, and 12 per cent. on money for opening a farm there, although it may look large to Eastern eyes, is not as much as 4 per cent. would be in many older and less fertile regions. The laws of Minnesota allow 12 per cent. interest on contracts, and thousands of en pay it, and grow independent by so doing, a few hundred dollars often enabling a man to put in and gather a harvest that yields him as many thousands. Parties, therefore, desiring to loan money at large legal rates can safely make G. L. Henderson & Co., of Leroy, their agents.—Central West.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY.

EVERY SATURDAY.

The Atlantic, for 1874, begins its thirty-third volume under the most prosperous auspices. The new publishers will spare no pains to keep it the Leading American Magazine, containing the fresh writings of Longfellow, Lowell, Aldrich, Parton, Whittier, Howells, Warner, Owen, Holmes, Bayard Taylor, Wells, Eggleston, with able criticisms upon current literature, art, and science.

Prudence Palfrey, a delightful novel by T. B. Aldrich, is begun in the January number, and

A Serial Story, by W. D. Howells, will begin in an early number.

Personal Reminiscences, by J. G. Whittier, will cover an eventful period in our history, and Life in the Confederate States, by a Confederate, will be an inside view of recent history.

Charles Dudley Warner's Saunterings in the British Provinces will be continued in subsequent numbers.

Robert Dale Owen's Autobiography, which has attracted so much attention, will be resumed, and chapters of peculiar interest will appear.

Local Taxation in the United States, the article in the first number by David A. Wells, will be followed by others from the same hand, on questions of Finance and Political Economy,

And there is every promise of the ablest and most attractive volume of The Atlantic ever published.

TERMS.—Single or specimen numbers, 35 cents. Yearly subscription, $4. The Atlantic and Every Saturday ($5) sent to one address for $8.

Every Saturday, a Journal of Choice Reading (Established January, 1866).—While retaining the prominent characteristics which have long made Every Saturday a favorite journal for the Fireside and the Railway, the forthcoming series will embrace several fresh and attractive features, among which may be mentioned Original American Stories, of which the first will be a serial, entitled "His Two Wives," a story of married life, by Mary Clemmer Ames, and a new Editorial Department devoted to the discussion of home literary, social, and scientific topics.

Under its new management Every Saturday will continue to lay before its readers each week the cream of the foreign weekly and monthly periodicals, giving in a compact and elegant form a larger amount and a greater variety of choice reading matter than is obtainable in any other publication of the same price.

The plan of Every Saturday embraces Serial Tales, Short Stories, Critical and Descriptive Essays, Sketches of Travel and Adventure, Poems, Biographical Papers, Papers on Popular Science, Literary Information; in fine, whatever contributes to produce a Weekly acceptable and attractive to all classes of intelligent American readers.

TERMS.—Weekly Parts, 10 cents; Monthly Parts, 50 cents; Yearly Subscription, $5.

N.B.—The Atlantic Monthly and Every Saturday sent to one address for $8.

$5 TO $20 PER DAY easily made by any one. We want men, women, boys, and girls all over the country to sell our fine Steel Engravings, Chromos, Crayon Drawings, Illuminations, Photographs, etc., etc. We now publish the finest assortment ever placed before the public, and our prices are marked down so low as to defy all competition. No one subscribes for a premium-giving paper in order to get a picture, after seeing our pictures and learning our prices. We have many old agents at work for us, who have made canvassing for books, papers, etc., their business for years, and they all report that they can make much more money at work for us than at anything else. Our prices are so low that all can afford to purchase, and therefore the pictures sell at sight at almost every house. New beginners do as well as agents who have had large experience, for our beautiful subjects and low prices are appreciated by all. To make large sales everywhere all an agent has to do is to show the pictures from house to house. Don't look for work elsewhere until you have seen what great inducements we offer you to make money. We have not space to explain all here, but send us your address and we will send full particulars, free, by mail. Don't delay if you want profitable work for your leisure hours, or for your whole time. Now is the favorable time to engage in this business. Our pictures are the finest and most pleasing in this country, and are endorsed by all the leading papers, including the New York Herald. Those who cannot give the business their entire attention can work up their own localities, and make a handsome sum without ever being away from home over night. Let all who want pleasant, profitable employment, without risking capital, send us their addresses at once, and learn all about the business for themselves. Address

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——;

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

PLYMOUTH CHURCH was organized December 1, 1852.

ARE THERE any mathematical objections to "going round the Square"?

THE Catholic Advocate denounces the new Constitution of Pennsylvania as a "fiendish instrument," because it provides for universal unsectarian education.

"WE DAILY THANK Heaven that we belong to no party in Church or State," says Mr. Tilton in the Golden Age. Is this a roundabout way of thanking himself?

THE COUNCIL of the "Sovereigns of Industry," a new organization of the labor reformers, has nearly one hundred members in this city. Rev. William R. Alger is Master of it.

LORD MACAULAY says that the Puritans suppressed bear-baiting because it gave pleasure to men, not because it gave pain to the bears! The grim old fellows were not up to Henry Bergh's standard.

REV. GEORGE H. HEPWORTH closes a tiresome paper in the Independent on "Which is the Happiest Period?" with the statement that "the happiest period is now." We thought so too, when we arrived at the little dot that put an end to his moralizings.

REV. ROBERT LAIRD COLLIER, of Chicago, gave a sermon lately which forebodes mischief to Unitarianism in that region. He believes in coming into his pulpit "with the whole truth upon his lips;" and when that happens, let the sects "stand from under"!

IT ALMOST reconciles us to the use of the judicial oath, when we learn that the City Treasurer of the newly-fledged city of Holyoke added as a rider to his oath of office, "And I swear that, if I see any more stealing going on, I will expose it." Give us a little more swearing of that sort.

THE MEETING at Nassau Hall, in this city, in honor of the one hundred and thirty-seventh anniversary of Thomas Paine's birth, was well attended. Speeches were made by Messrs. Horace Seaver, J. P. Mendum, J. M. Hartley, S. B. Ramsdell, F. E. Abbot, and others; and all concerned regarded the meeting as a successful and interesting occasion.

MR. SUMNER'S "Civil Rights Bill" is sure to triumph sooner or later in some shape. It is hard to understand the opposition to it on the part of Republican "statesmen," when it is the natural result of Republican ideas. But personal jealousies are always incomprehensible to those who do not share them. When history tells the story of Sumner's life, the clear amber of his fame will entomb more than one spider.

PROFESSOR MAX MUELLER'S Lecture in Westminster Abbey, which has created so profound a sensation in England and excited so intense a curiosity in this country to learn what terrible things he had to say on the subject of Missions, will be found entire in this paper, reprinted from the London pamphlet edition of the Lecture which Professor Müller has kindly forwarded for our use. It has not yet, we understand, been republished on this side the Atlantic until now; and it will doubtless be read with keen interest by all.

THE CASE OF the Smith sisters, of Glastonbury, Connecticut, whose seven cows were lately sold at auction because their owners objected to paying taxes while being denied the right of representation and suffrage, has naturally awakened the sympathy and indignation of thousands of people all over the country. The action of these ladies seems to have been as dignified as it was uncompromising, and constitutes one of those test-cases which arrest public attention to public injustice, thereby paving the way for reform. If a woman is required to pay taxes, why, in the name of all reason, should she not have the right to vote? The woman-suffragists may well point to this instance as signally illustrating the reasonableness of their demand.

MR. WILLIAM T. HARRIS, of St. Louis, is one of the most valuable men that America has yet produced. The Journal of Speculative Philosophy which he edits is an honor to the country, and shows that the United States already boast enough thinkers of a high order to sustain a magazine devoted entirely to pure philosophy. At the same time, as Superintendent of the St. Louis schools, Mr. Harris has rendered, and is still rendering, equal services to the cause of education. His recent lecture on the "Relation of Philosophy to Society, Art, and Religion," though not expressing our own views in all respects on the subject, is a production which commands our admiration by the fine culture and broad thought it evinces; and St. Louis is to be congratulated for the discernment it shows in placing such a man in the important position he holds.

AT THE LAST meeting of the Second Radical Club, Mr. E. H. Heywood, editor of the Princeton (Mass.) Word, made a strong and telling address on "Labor, its Relations to Property and Usury." The earnestness of his spirit and the force of his style made no little impression on the audience, which was fine. He took the ground that all right to property consists in service or labor; that there is no such thing in equity as "ownership in natural resources," which belong equally to all as the free gift of Nature; and yet that labor is entitled to "all it creates," as if it created anything but the form of materials already created. We do not see how to reconcile these ideas. The man who sells a thousand of bricks claims ownership in the bricks, because he has impressed his labor on the clay they are made of; but how, on the above principles, does his labor make the clay his property, when it is still nothing but "natural resources," and therefore, as alleged, no man's special property? No answer could be got to this question; can Mr. Heywood give any answer to it? Again, a new and very important statement on the "interest question" leaked out. Mr. Heywood conceded that the lender might charge equitably about one-half per cent. for the cost, risk, sacrifice, &c., involved in the loan. Now this one-half per cent. is what the world calls interest. Mr. Heywood may call it the cost of the transaction, or what he pleases; the point is that, when the loan is returned, any increase of the exact amount borrowed is interest, and it is ludicrous to talk of abolishing interest when the great reform consists in merely reducing the rate. Is that all our anti-interest friends mean? If so, the whole principle they have seemed to be contending for vanishes in smoke.

Lecture on Missions

DELIVERED IN THE NAVE OF WESTMINSTER ABBEY ON THE EVENING OF DECEMBER 3, 1873.

BY PROFESSOR MAX MUELLER.

NUMBER OF HISTORICAL RELIGIONS.

The number of religions which have attained stability and permanence in the history of the world is very small. If we leave out of consideration those vague and varying forms of faith and worship which we find among uncivilized and unsettled races, among races ignorant of reading and writing, who have neither a literature, nor laws, nor even hymns and prayers handed down by oral teaching from father to son, from mother to daughter, we see that the number of the real historical religions of mankind amounts to no more than eight. The Semitic races have produced three—the Jewish, the Christian, the Mohammedan; the Aryan, or Indo-European races, an equal number—the Brahman, the Buddhist, and the Parsi. Add to these the two religious systems of China, that of Confucius and Lao-tse, and you have before you what may be called the eight distinct languages or utterances of the faith of mankind from the beginning of the world to the present day; you have before you in broad outlines the religious map of the whole world.

COMPARATIVE STUDY OF RELIGIONS.

All these religions, however, have a history, a history more deeply interesting than the history of language, of literature, of art, of politics. Religions are not unchangeable; on the contrary, they are always growing and changing; and if they cease to grow and cease to change, they cease to live. Some of these religions stand by themselves, totally independent of all the rest; others are closely united, or have influenced each other during various stages of their growth and decay. They must therefore be studied together, if we wish to understand their real character, their growth, their decay, and their resuscitations. Thus, Mohammedanism would be unintelligible without Christianity; Christianity without Judaism; and there are similar bonds that hold together the great religions of India and Persia—the faith of the Brahman, the Buddhist, and the Parsi. After a careful study of the origin and growth of these religions, and after a critical examination of the sacred books on which all of them profess to be founded, it has become possible to subject them all to a scientific classification, in the same manner as languages, apparently unconnected and mutually unintelligible, have been scientifically arranged and classified; and by a comparison of those points which all or some of them share in common, as well as by a determination of those which are peculiar to each, a new science has been called into life, a science which concerns us all, and in which all who truly care for religion must sooner or later take their part—the science of religion.

MISSIONARY AND NON-MISSIONARY RELIGIONS.

Among the various classifications which have been applied to the religions of the world, there is one that interests us more immediately to-night, I mean the division into non-missionary and missionary religions. This is by no means, as might be supposed, a classification based on an unimportant or merely accidental characteristic; on the contrary, it rests on what is the very heart-blood in every system of human faith. Among the six religions of the Aryan and Semitic world, there are three that are opposed to all missionary enterprise—Judaism, Brahmanism, and Zoroastrianism; and three that have a missionary character from their very beginning—Buddhism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity.

JUDAISM.

The Jews, particularly in ancient times, never thought of spreading their religion. Their religion was to them a treasure, a privilege, a blessing, something to distinguish them, as the chosen people of God, from all the rest of the world. A Jew must be of the seed of Abraham; and when in later times, owing chiefly to political circumstances, the Jews had to admit strangers to some of the privileges of their theocracy, they looked upon them, not as souls that had been gained, saved, born again into a new brotherhood, but as strangers, as proselytes; which means men who have come to them as aliens, not to be trusted, as their saying was, until the twenty-fourth generation.

BRAHMANISM.

A very similar feeling prevented the Brahmans from ever attempting to proselytize those who did not by birth belong to the spiritual aristocracy of their country. Their wish was rather to keep the light to themselves, to repel intruders; they went so far as to punish those who happened to be near enough to hear even the sound of their prayers, or to witness their sacrifices.

ZOROASTRIANISM.

The Parsi, too, does not wish for converts to his religion; he is proud of his faith, as of his blood; and though he believes in the final victory of truth and light, though he says to every man, "Be bright as the sun, pure as the moon," he himself does very little to drive away spiritual darkness from the face of the earth, by letting the light that is within him shine before the world.

MISSIONARY RELIGIONS.

But now let us look at the other cluster of religions, at Buddhism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity. However they may differ from each other in some of their most essential doctrines, this they share in common—they all have faith in themselves, they all have life and vigor, they want to convince, they mean to conquer. From the very earliest dawn of their existence these three religions were missionary; their very founders, or their first apostles, recognized the new duty of spreading the truth, of refuting error, of bringing the whole world to acknowledge the paramount, if not the divine, authority of their doctrines. That is what gives to them all a common expression, and lifts them high above the level of the other religions of the world.

BUDDHISM.

Let us begin with Buddhism. We know, indeed, very little of its origin and earliest growth, for the earliest beginnings of all religions withdraw themselves by necessity from the eye of the historian. But we have something like contemporary evidence of the Great Council, held at Pataliputra, 246 B.C., in which the sacred canon of the Buddhist scriptures was settled, and at the end of which missionaries were chosen and sent forth to preach the new doctrine, not only in India, but far beyond the frontiers of that vast country. We possess inscriptions containing the edicts of the King who was to Buddhism what Constantine was to Christianity, who broke with the traditions of the old religion of the Brahmans, and recognized the doctrines of Buddha as the state religion of India. We possess the description of that Buddhist Council, which was to India what the Council of Nicæa, 570 years later, was to Europe; and we can still read there the simple story, how the chief Elder who had presided over the Council, an old man, too weak to travel by land, and carried from his hermitage to the Council in a boat—how that man, when the Council was over, began to reflect on the future, and found that the time had come to establish the religion of Buddha in foreign countries. He therefore dispatched some of the most eminent priests to Cashmere, Cabul, and farther west, to the colonies founded by the Greeks in Bactria, to Alexandria on the Caucasus, and other cities. He sent others northward to Nepaul, and to the inhabited portions of the Himalayan Mountains. Another mission proceeded to the Dekhan, to the people of Mysore, to the Mahrattas, perhaps to Goa; nay, even Birma and Ceylon are mentioned as among the earliest missionary stations of Buddhist priests. We still possess accounts of their manner of preaching. When threatened by infuriated crowds, one of those Buddhist missionaries said calmly, "Even if the gods were united with men, they would not frighten me away." And when he had brought the people to listen, he dismissed them with the simple prayer, "Do not hereafter give way to pride and anger; care for the happiness of all living beings, and abstain from violence. Extend your good-will to all mankind; let there be peace among the dwellers on earth."

No doubt, the accounts of the successes achieved by those early missionaries are exaggerated, and their fights with snakes and dragons and evil spirits remind us sometimes of the legendary accounts of the achievements of such men as St. Patrick in Ireland, or St. Boniface in Germany. But the fact that missionaries were sent out to convert the world seems beyond the reach of doubt; and this fact represents to us at that time a new thought, new, not only in the history of India, but in the history of the whole world. The recognition of a duty to preach the truth to every man, woman, and child, was an idea opposed to the deepest instincts of Brahmanism; and when, at the end of the chapter on the first missions, we read the simple words of the old chronicler, "Who would demur, if the salvation of the world is at stake?" we feel at once that we move in a new world, we see the dawn of a new day, the opening of vaster horizons—we feel, for the first time in the history of the world, the beating of the great heart of humanity.

MOHAMMEDANISM.

The Korán breathes a different spirit; it does not invite, it rather compels the world to come in. Yet there are passages, particularly in the earlier portions, which show that Mohammed, too, had realized the idea of humanity, and of a religion of humanity; nay, that at first he wished to unite his own religion with that of the Jews and Christians, comprehending all under the common name of Islām. Islām meant originally humility or devotion; and all who humbled themselves before God, and were filled with real reverence, were called Moslim. "The Islām," says Mohammed, "is the true worship of God. When men dispute with you, say, 'I am a Moslim.' Ask those who have sacred books, and ask the heathen: 'Are you Moslim?' If they are, they are on the right path; but if they turn away, then you have no other task but to deliver the message, to preach to them the Islām."

CHRISTIANITY.

As to our own religion, its very soul is missionary, progressive, world-embracing; it would cease to exist if it ceased to be missionary—if it disregarded the parting words of its Founder: "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things I have commanded; and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

It is this missionary character, peculiar to these three religions, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity, which binds them together, and lifts them to a higher sphere. Their differences, no doubt, are great; on some points they are opposed to each other like day and night. But they could not be what they are, they could not have achieved what they have achieved, unless the spirit of truth and the spirit of love had been alive in the hearts of their founders, their first messengers and missionaries.

THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH.

The spirit of truth is the life-spring of all religion, and where it exists it must manifest itself, it must plead, it must persuade, it must convince and convert. Missionary work, however, in the usual sense of the word, is only one manifestation of that spirit; for the same spirit which fills the heart of the missionary with daring abroad gives courage also to the preacher at home, bearing witness to the truth that is within him. The religions which can boast of missionaries who left the old home of their childhood, and parted with parents and friends—never to meet again in this life,—who went into the wilderness, willing to spend a life of toil among strangers, ready, if need be, to lay down their life as witnesses to the truth, as martyrs for the glory of God—the same religions are rich also in those honest and intrepid inquirers who, at the bidding of the same spirit of truth, were ready to leave behind them the cherished creed of their childhood, to separate from the friends they loved best, to stand alone among men that shrug their shoulders, and ask "What is truth?" and to bear in silence a martyrdom more galling often than death itself. There are men who say that, if they held the whole truth in their hand, they would not open one finger. Such men know little of the working of the spirit of truth, of the true missionary spirit. As long as there is doubt and darkness and anxiety in the soul of an inquirer, reticence may be his natural attitude. But when once doubt has yielded to certainty, darkness to light, anxiety to joy, the rays of truth will burst forth; and to close our hand, or to shut our lips, would be as impossible as for the petals of a flower to shut themselves against the summons of the sun of spring.

What is there in this short life that should seal our lips? What should we wait for, if we are not to speak here and now? There is missionary work at home as much as abroad; there are thousands waiting to listen, if one man will but speak the truth, and nothing but the truth; there are thousands starving, because they cannot find that food which is convenient for them.

THE SPIRIT OF LOVE.

And even if the spirit of truth might be chained down by fear or prudence, the spirit of love would never yield. Once recognize the common brotherhood of mankind, not as a name or a theory, but as a real bond, as a bond more binding, more lasting than the bonds of family, caste, and race, and the questions, Why should I open my hand? why should I open my heart? why should I speak to my brother? will never be asked again. Is it not far better to speak than to walk through life silent, unknown, unknowing? Has any one of us ever spoken to his friend, and opened to him his inmost soul, and been answered with harshness or repelled with scorn? Has any one of us, be he priest or layman, ever listened to the honest questionings of a truth-loving soul, without feeling his own soul filled with love? aye, without feeling humbled by the very honesty of a brother's confession?

If we would but confess, friend to friend, if we would be but honest, man to man, we should not want confessors or confessionals.

If our doubts and difficulties are self-made, if they can be removed by wiser and better men, why not give to our brother the opportunity of helping us? But if our difficulties are not self-made, if they are not due either to ignorance or presumption, is it not even then better for us to know that we are all carrying the same burden, the common burden of humanity, if haply we may find that for the heavy laden there is but one who can give them rest.

There may be times when silence is gold, and speech silver; but there are times also when silence is death, and speech is life—the very life of Pentecost.

How can man be afraid of man? How can we be afraid of those whom we love?

Are the young afraid of the old? But nothing delights the older man more than to see that he is trusted by the young, and that they believe he will tell them the truth.

Are the old afraid of the young? But nothing sustains the young more than to know that they do not stand alone in their troubles, and that in many trials of the soul the father is as helpless as the child.

Are women afraid of men? But men are not wiser in the things appertaining to God than women, and real love of God is theirs far more than ours.

Are men afraid of women? But though women may hide their troubles more carefully, their heart aches as much as ours, when they whisper to themselves, "Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief."

Are the laity afraid of the clergy? But where is the clergyman who would not respect honest doubt more than unquestioning faith?

Are the clergy afraid of the laity? But surely we know in this place that the clear voice of honesty and humility draws more hearts than the harsh accents of dogmatic assurance or ecclesiastic exclusiveness.

A missionary must know no fear; his heart must overflow with love—love of man, love of truth, love of God; and in this, the highest and truest sense of the word, every Christian is, or ought to be, a missionary.

THE FATE OF NON-MISSIONARY RELIGION.

And now, let us look again at the religions in which the missionary spirit has been at work, and compare them with those in which any attempt to convince others by argument, to save souls, to bear witness to the truth, is treated with pity or scorn. The former are alive, the latter are dying or dead.

ZOROASTRIANISM.

The religion of Zoroaster—the religion of Cyrus, of Darius and Xerxes—which, but for the battles of Marathon and Salamis, might have become the religion of the civilized world, is now professed by only 100,000 souls—that is by about a ten-thousandth part of the inhabitants of the world. During the last two centuries their number has steadily decreased from four to one hundred thousand, and another century will probably exhaust what is still left of the worshippers of the Wise Spirit, Ahuramazda.

JUDAISM.

The Jews are about thirty times the number of the Parsis, and they therefore represent a more appreciative portion of mankind. Though it is not likely that they will ever increase in number, yet such is their physical vigor and their intellectual tenacity, such also their pride of race and their faith in Jehovah, that we can hardly imagine that their patriarchal religion and their ancient customs will soon vanish from the face of the earth.

BRAHMANISM.

But though the religions of the Parsis and Jews might justly seem to have paid the penalty of their anti-missionary spirit, how, it will be said, can the same be maintained with regard to the religion of the Brahmans? That religion is still professed by at least 110,000,000 of human souls, and, to judge from the last census, even that enormous number falls much short of the real truth. And yet I do not shrink from saying that their religion is dying or dead. And why? Because it cannot stand the light of day. The worship of Siva, of Vishnu, and the other popular deities, is of the same, nay, in many cases of a more degraded and savage character than the worship of Jupiter, Apollo, and Minerva; it belongs to a stratum of thought which is long buried beneath our feet; it may live on, like the lion and the tiger, but the mere air of free thought and civilized life will extinguish it. A religion may linger on for a long time, it may be accepted by the large masses of the people, because it is there, and there is nothing better. But when a religion has ceased to produce defenders of the faith, prophets, champions, martyrs, it has ceased to live; and in this sense Brahmanism has ceased to live for more than a thousand years.

It is true there are millions of children, women, and men in India who fall down before the stone image of Vishnu, with his four arms, riding on a creature half bird, half man, or sleeping on the serpent; who worship Siva, a monster with three eyes, riding naked on a bull, with a necklace of skulls for his ornament. There are human beings who still believe in a god of war, Kārtikēya, with six faces, riding on a peacock, and holding bow and arrow in his hands; and who invoke a god of success, Ganesa, with four hands and an elephant's head, sitting on a rat. Nay, it is true that, in the broad daylight of the nineteenth century, the figure of the goddess Kali is carried through the streets of her own city, Calcutta, her wild dishevelled hair reaching to her feet, with a necklace of human heads, her tongue protruded from her mouth, her girdle stained with blood. All this is true; but ask any Hindu, who can read and write and think, whether these are the gods he believes in, and he will smile at your credulity. How long this living death of national religion in India may last, no one can tell; for our purposes, however, for gaining an idea of the issue of the great religious struggle of the future, that religion too is dead and gone.

THE THREE LIVING RELIGIONS.

The three religions which are alive, and between which the decisive battle for the dominion of the world will have to be fought, are the three missionary religions, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity. Though religious statistics are perhaps the most uncertain of all, yet it is well to have a general conception of the forces of our enemies; and it is well to know that, though the number of Christians is double the number of Mohammedans, the Buddhist religion still occupies the first place in the religious census of mankind.

Buddhism rules supreme in Central, Northern, Eastern, and Southern Asia, and it gradually absorbs whatever there is left of aboriginal heathenism in that vast and populous area.

Mohammedanism claims as its own Arabia, Persia, great parts of India, Asia Minor, Turkey, and Egypt; and its greatest conquests by missionary efforts are made among the heathen population of Africa.

Christianity reigns in Europe and America, and it is conquering the native races of Polynesia and Melanesia, while its missionary outposts are scattered all over the world.

Between these three powers, then, the religious battle of the future, the Holy War of mankind, will have to be fought, and is being fought at the present moment, though apparently with little effect. To convert a Mohammedan is difficult; to convert a Buddhist, more difficult still; to convert a Christian, let us hope, well nigh impossible.

OBJECTS OF MISSIONS.

What, then, it may be asked, is the use of missionaries? Why should we spend millions on foreign missions, when there are children in our cities who are allowed to grow up in ignorance? Why should we deprive ourselves of some of the noblest, boldest, most ardent and devoted spirits, and send them into the wilderness, while so many laborers are wanted in the vineyard at home?

It is right to ask these questions; and we ought not to blame those political economists who tell us that every convert costs us £200, and that at the present rate of progress it would take more than 200,000 years to evangelize the world. There is nothing at all startling in these figures. Every child born in Europe is as much a heathen as the child of a Melanesian cannibal; and it costs us more than £200 to turn a child into a Christian man. The other calculation is totally erroneous; for an intellectual harvest must not be calculated by adding simply grain to grain, but by counting each grain as a living seed, that will bring forth fruit a hundred and a thousand fold.

PATERNAL MISSIONS.

If we want to know what work there is for the missionary to do, what results we may expect from it, we must distinguish between two kinds of work: the one is parental, the other controversial. Among uncivilized races the work of the missionary is the work of a parent; whether his pupils are young in years or old, he has to treat them with a parent's love, to teach them with a parent's authority; he has to win them, not to argue with them. I know this kind of missionary work is often despised; it is called mere religious kidnapping; and it is said that missionary success obtained by such means proves nothing for the truth of Christianity; that the child handed over to a Mohammedan would grow up a Mohammedan, as much as a child taken by a Christian missionary becomes a Christian. All this is true; missionary success obtained by such means proves nothing for the truth of our creeds; but it proves—what is far more important—it proves Christian love. Read only the Life of Patteson, the Bishop of Melanesia; follow him in his vessel, sailing from island to island, begging for children, carrying them off as a mother her new-born child, nursing them, washing and combing them, clothing them, feeding them, teaching them in his Episcopal Palace, in which he himself is everything, nurse, and housemaid, and cook, schoolmaster, physician, and Bishop—read there, how that man who tore himself away from his aged father, from his friends, from his favorite studies and pursuits, had the most loving of hearts for these children, how indignantly he repelled for them the name of savages, how he trusted them, respected them, honored them, and, when they were formed and established, took them back to their island homes, there to be a leaven for future ages. Yes, read the life, the work, the death of that man, a death in very truth, a ransom for the sins of others—and then say whether you would like to suppress a profession that can call forth such self-denial, such heroism, such sanctity, such love. It has been my privilege to have known some of the finest and noblest spirits which England has produced during this century, but there is none to whose memory I look up with greater reverence, none by whose friendship I feel more deeply humbled, than by that of that true saint, that true martyr, that truly parental missionary.

The work of the parental missionary is clear, and its success undeniable, not only in Polynesia and Melanesia, but in many parts of India—(think only of the bright light of Tinnevelly)—in Africa, in China, in America, in Syria, in Turkey, aye, in the very heart of London.

CONTROVERSIAL MISSIONS.

The case is different with the controversial missionary, who has to attack the faith of men brought up in other religions, in religions which contain much truth, though mixed up with much error. Here the difficulties are immense, the results very discouraging. Nor need we wonder at this. We know, each of us, but too well, how little argument avails in theological discussion; how often it produces the very opposite result of what we expected; confirming rather than shaking opinions no less erroneous, no less indefensible, than many articles of the Mohammedan or Buddhist faith.

And even when argument proves successful, when it forces a verdict from an unwilling judge, how often has the result been disappointing; because in tearing up the rotten stem on which the tree rested, its tenderest fibres have been injured, its roots unsettled, its life destroyed.

We have little ground to expect that these controversial weapons will carry the day in the struggle between the three great religions of the world.

INDIRECT INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

But there is a third kind of missionary activity, which has produced the most important results, and through which alone, I believe, the final victory will be gained. Whenever two religions are brought into contact, when members of each live together in peace, abstaining from all direct attempts at conversion, whether by force or by argument, though conscious all the time of the fact that they and their religion are on their trial, that they are being watched, that they are responsible for all they say and do, the effect has always been the greatest blessing to both. It calls out all the best elements in each, and at the same time keeps under all that is felt to be of doubtful value, of uncertain truth. Whenever this has happened in the history of the world, it has generally led either to the reform of both systems, or to the foundation of a new religion.

INFLUENCE OF MOHAMMEDANISM ON BRAHMANISM.

When after the conquest of India the violent measures for the conversion of the Hindus to Mohammedanism had ceased, and Mohammedans and Brahmans lived together in the enjoyment of perfect equality, the result was a purified Mohammedanism, and a purified Brahmanism. The worshippers of Vishnu, Siva, and other deities, became ashamed of these mythological gods; and were led to admit that there was, either over and above these individual deities, or instead of them, a higher divine power (the Para-Brahma), the true source of all being, the only and almighty ruler of the world. That religious movement assumed its most important development at the beginning of the twelfth century, when Rāmānuga founded the reformed sect of the worshippers of Vishnu; and again, in the fourteenth century, when his fifth successor, Rāmānanda, imparted a still more liberal character to that powerful sect. Not only did he abolish many of the restrictions of caste, many of the minute ceremonial observances in eating, drinking, and bathing, but he replaced the classical Sanscrit—which was unintelligible to the large masses of the people—by the living vernaculars, in which he preached a purer worship of God.

KABIR.

The most remarkable man of that time was a weaver, the pupil of Rāmānanda, known by the name of Kabir. He indeed deserved the name which the members of the reformed sect claimed for themselves, Avadhūta, which means one who has shaken off the dust of superstition. He broke entirely with the popular mythology and the customs of the ceremonial law, and addressed himself alike to Hindu and Mohammedan. According to him, there is but one God, the creator of the world, without beginning and end, of inconceivable purity, and irresistible strength. The pure man is the image of God, and after death attains community with God. The commandments of Kabir are few: Not to injure anything that has life, for life is of God; to speak the truth; to keep aloof from the world; to obey the teacher. His poetry is most beautiful, hardly surpassed in any other language.

NANAK, FOUNDER OF THE SIKH RELIGION.

Still more important in the history of India was the reform of Nānak, the founder of the Sikh religion. He, too, worked entirely in the spirit of Kabir. Both labored to persuade the Hindus and Mohammedans that the truly essential parts of their creeds were the same, that they ought to discard the varieties of practical detail, and the corruptions of their teachers, for the worship of the One Only Supreme, whether he was termed Allah or Vishnu.

The effect of these religious reforms has been highly beneficial; it has cut into the very roots of idolatry, and has spread throughout India an intelligent and spiritual worship, which may at any time develop into a higher national creed.

INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY ON BRAHMANISM.

The same effect which Mohammedanism produced on Hinduism is now being produced in a much higher degree on the religious mind of India by the mere presence of Christianity. That silent influence began to tell many years ago, even at a time when no missionaries were allowed within the territory of the old East India Company.

RAM MOHUN ROY AND THE BRAHMA-SAMAJ.

Its first representative was Ram Mohun Roy, born just one hundred years ago, in 1772, who died at Bristol in 1833, the founder of the Brahma-Samāj. A man so highly cultivated and so highly religious as he was could not but feel humiliated at the spectacle which the popular religion of his country presented to his English friends. He drew their attention to the fact that there was a purer religion to be found in the old sacred writings of his people, the Vedas. He went so far as to claim for the Vedas a divine origin, and to attempt the foundation of a reformed faith on their authority. In this attempt he failed.

INSPIRATION OF THE VEDAS.

No doubt the Vedas and other works of the ancient poets and prophets of India contain treasures of truth, which ought never to be forgotten, least of all by the sons of India. The late good Bishop Cotton, in his address to the students of a missionary institution at Calcutta, advised them to use a certain hymn of the Rig-Veda in their daily prayers. Nowhere do we find stronger arguments against idolatry, nowhere has the unity of the Deity been upheld more strenuously against the errors of polytheism than by some of the ancient sages of India. Even in the oldest of their sacred books, the Rig-Veda, composed three or four thousand years ago—where we find hymns addressed to the different deities of the sky, the air, the earth, the rivers—the protest of the human heart against many gods breaks forth from time to time with no uncertain sound. One poet, after he has asked to whom sacrifice is due, answers, "To Him who is God above all gods." Another poet, after enumerating the names of many deities, affirms, without hesitation, that "these are all but names of Him who is One." And even when single deities are invoked, it is not difficult to see that, in the mind of the poet, each one of the names is meant to express the highest conception of Deity of which the human mind was then capable. The god of the sky is called Father and Mother and Friend; he is the Creator, the Upholder of the Universe; he rewards virtue and punishes sin; he listens to the prayers of those who love him.

But granting all this, we may well understand why an attempt to claim for these books a divine origin, and thus make them an artificial foundation for a new religion, failed.

DEBENDRANATH TAGORE.

The successor of Ram Mohun Roy, the present head of the Brahma-Samāj, the wise and excellent Debendranāth Tagore, was for a time even more decided in holding to the Vedas as the sole foundation of the new faith. But this could not last. As soon as the true character of the Vedas, which but few people in India can understand, became known, partly through the efforts of native, partly of European scholars, the Indian reformers relinquished the claim of divine inspiration in favor of their Vedas, and were satisfied with a selection of passages from the works of the ancient sages of India, to express and embody the creed which the members of the Brahma-Samāj hold in common.

The work which these religious reformers have been doing in India is excellent, and those only who know what it is, in religious matters, to break with the past, to forsake the established custom of a nation, to oppose the rush of public opinion, to brave adverse criticism, to submit to social persecution, can form any idea of what those men have suffered, in bearing witness to the truth that was within them.

SCHISM IN THE BRAHMA-SAMAJ.

They could not reckon on any sympathy on the part of Christian missionaries; nor did their work attract much attention in Europe till very lately, when a schism broke out in the Brahma-Samāj between the old conservative party and a new party, led by Keshub Chunder Sen.

KESHUB CHUNDER SEN.

The former, though willing to surrender all that was clearly idolatrous in the ancient religion and customs of India, wished to retain all that might safely be retained; it did not wish to see the religion of India denationalized. The other party, inspired and led by Keshub Chunder Sen, went further in their zeal for religious purity. All that smacked of the old leaven was to be surrendered; not only caste, but even that sacred cord—the religious ribbon which makes and marks the Brahman, which is to remind him at every moment of his life, and whatever work he may be engaged in, of his God, of his ancestors, and of his children—even that was to be abandoned; and instead of founding their creed exclusively on the utterances of the ancient sages of their own country, all that was best in the sacred books of the whole world was selected and formed into a new sacred Code.

The schism between these two parties is deeply to be deplored. But it is a sign of life. It augurs success rather than failure for the future. It is the same schism which St. Paul had to heal in the Church of Corinth, and he healed it with the words, so often misunderstood, "Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth."

RELATION OF MISSIONARIES TO THE BRAHMA-SAMAJ.

In the eyes of our missionaries this religious reform in India has not found much favor; nor need we wonder at this. Their object is to transplant, if possible, Christianity in its full integrity from England to India, as we might wish to transplant a full-grown tree. They do not deny the moral worth, the noble aspirations, the self-sacrificing zeal of these native reformers; but they fear that all this will but increase their dangerous influence, and retard the progress of Christianity, by drawing some of the best minds of India, that might have been gained over to our religion, into a different current. They feel towards Keshub Chunder Sen as Athanasius might have felt towards Ulfilas, the Arian Bishop of the Goths; and yet, what would have become of Christianity in Europe but for those Gothic races, but for those Arian heretics, who were considered more dangerous than downright pagans?

BRAHMA-SAMAJ A TRANSITION TO A NEW CREED.

If we think of the future of India, and of the influence which that country has always exercised on the East, the movement of religious reform which is now going on appears to my mind the most momentous in this momentous century. If our missionaries feel constrained to repudiate it as their own work, history will be more just to them than they themselves. And if not as the work of Christian missionaries, it will be recognized hereafter as the work of those missionary Christians who have lived in India, as examples of a true Christian life, who have approached the natives in a truly missionary spirit, in the spirit of truth and in the spirit of love; whose bright presence has thawed the ice, and brought out beneath it the old soil, ready to blossom into new life. These Indian puritans are not against us; for all the highest purposes of life they are with us, and we, I trust, with them. What would the early Christians have said to men, outside the pale of Christianity, who spoke of Christ and his doctrine as some of these Indian reformers? Would they have said to them, "Unless you speak our language and think our thoughts, unless you respect our Creed and sign our Articles, we can have nothing in common with you"?

MISSIONARIES MUST NOT REQUIRE TOO MUCH.

O that Christians, and particularly missionaries, would lay to heart the words of a missionary Bishop! "I have for years thought," writes Bishop Patteson, "that we seek in our missions a great deal too much to make English Christians. . . . Evidently the heathen man is not treated fairly, if we encumber our message with unnecessary requirements. The ancient Church had its 'selection of fundamentals.' . . . Any one can see what mistakes we have made in India. . . . Few men think themselves into the state of the Eastern mind. . . . We seek to denationalize these races, as far as I can see; whereas we ought surely to change as little as possible—only what is clearly incompatible with the simplest form of Christian teaching and practice. I do not mean that we are to compromise truth, . . . but do we not overlay it a good deal with human traditions?"

BISHOP PATTESON AND BISHOP COTTON.

If we had many such missionaries as Bishop Patteson and Bishop Cotton, if Christianity were not only preached, but lived in that spirit, it would then prove itself what it is—the religion of humanity at large, large enough itself to take in all shades and diversities of character and race.

And more than that—if this true missionary spirit, this spirit of truth and love, of forbearance, of trust, of toleration, of humility, were once to kindle the hearts of all those chivalrous ambassadors of Christ, the message of the Gospel which they have to deliver would then become as great a blessing to the giver as to the receiver. Even now, missionary work unites, both at home and abroad, those who are widely separated by the barriers of theological sects.

MISSIONARY WORK A BOND OF UNION.

It might do so far more still. When we stand before a common enemy, we soon forget our own small feuds. But why? Often, I fear, from motives of prudence only and selfishness. Can we not, then, if we stand in spirit before a common friend—can we not, before the face of God, forget our small feuds, for very shame? If missionaries admit to their fold converts who can hardly understand the equivocal abstractions of our creeds and formulas, is it necessary to exclude those who understand them but too well to submit the wings of their free spirit to such galling chains? When we try to think of the majesty of God, what are all those formulas but the stammerings of children, which only a loving father can interpret and understand! The fundamentals of our religion are not in these poor creeds; true Christianity lives, not in our belief, but in our love—in our love of God, and in our love of man, founded on our love of God.

TRUE CHRISTIANITY.

That is the whole Law and the Prophets, that is the religion to be preached to the whole world, that is the Gospel which will conquer all other religions—even Buddhism and Mohommedanism—which will win the hearts of all men.

There can never be too much love, though there may be too much faith—particularly when it leads to the requirement of exactly the same measure of faith in others. Let those who wish for the true success of missionary work learn to throw in of the abundance of their faith; let them learn to demand less from others than from themselves. That is the best offering, the most valuable contribution which they can make to-day to the missionary cause.

Let missionaries preach the Gospel again as it was preached when it began the conquest of the Roman Empire and the Gothic nations; when it had to struggle with powers and principalities, with time-honored religions and triumphant philosophies, with pride of civilization and savagery of life—and yet came out victorious. At that time conversion was not a question to be settled by the acceptance or rejection of certain formulas or articles; a simple prayer was often enough: "God be merciful to me a sinner."

TWO KINDS OF FAITH.

There is one kind of faith that revels in words, there is another that can hardly find utterance: the former is like riches that come to us by inheritance; the latter is like the daily bread, which each of us has to win in the sweat of his brow. We cannot expect the former from new converts; we ought not to expect it or exact it, for fear that it might lead to hypocrisy or superstition. The mere believing of miracles, the mere repeating of formulas, requires no effort in converts, brought up to believe in the Purānas of the Brahmans or the Buddhist Gātakas. They find it much easier to accept a legend than to love God, to repeat a creed than to forgive their enemies. In this respect they are exactly like ourselves. Let missionaries remember that the Christian faith at home is no longer what it was, and that it is impossible to have one creed to preach abroad, another to preach at home. Much that was formerly considered as essential is now neglected; much that was formerly neglected is now considered as essential. I think of the laity more than of the clergy; but what would the clergy be without the laity? There are many of our best men, men of the greatest power and influence in literature, science, art, politics, aye, even in the Church itself, who are no longer Christian in the old sense of the word. Some imagine they have ceased to be Christians altogether, because they feel that they cannot believe as much as others profess to believe. We cannot afford to lose these men, nor shall we lose them if we learn to be satisfied with what satisfied Christ and the Apostles, with what satisfies many a hard-working missionary. If Christianity is to retain its hold on Europe and America, if it is to conquer in the Holy War of the future, it must throw off its heavy armor, the helmet of brass and the coat of mail, and face the world like David, with his staff, his stones, and his sling. We want less of creeds, but more of trust; less of ceremony, but more of work; less of solemnity, but more of genial honesty; less of doctrine, but more of love. There is a faith, as small as a grain of mustard-seed, but that grain alone can move mountains, and more than that, it can move hearts. Whatever the world may say of us, of us of little faith, let us remember that there was One who accepted the offering of the poor widow. She threw in but two mites, but that was all she had, even all her living.

REMINISCENCES OF FREE DISCUSSION IN BOSTON.

Mr. Editor:—

I have been solicited by a friend of mine who takes a profound interest in your excellent paper to write a few sketches relative to the origin of the "Free Sunday Meetings" in Boston. But unfortunately, as those meetings have never been organized, and of course no officers elected, constitution or by-laws adopted, or records kept of their proceedings, I shall be obliged to trust to my memory for what I write.

Although liable to omissions, and perhaps mistakes, still I am convinced that my remembrance of them is accurate enough to give substantially the information desired.

The meetings at Hospitaller Hall, in Boston, which are now in the full tide of successful operation, had their beginning some twenty-five years ago in what was then called Chapman Hall (Chapman Place), but is now occupied in part by the Parker House.

The Sunday Institute (a name suggested to the writer and manager of that meeting by his friend, Mr. Horace Seaver, of the Boston Investigator) sprung up out of the ashes of a modern spiritual brotherhood which vainly tried to advance the cause of the "Mystic Rap" by the aid of free discussion. But after an experience of three short months, it was found by the manager, Mr. Peter Blacker, that there was no affinity between spirit-rapping and a free, untrammelled platform. So he stepped out, and the unbelievers moved in; and from that hour to the present the votaries of the Fox girls have avoided the companionship of the "free discussionists," because of the annoying and perplexing angularities so distressing and offensive to the true and faithful believers in the "Harmonial Philosophy." Though the main body of the faithful withdrew about this time, there still remained a few of the unterrified who manfully contended for the faith recently delivered to the Modern Saints. But free discussion at last drove the remaining few to seek a shelter under another canopy, where the traders in human credulity would not be subjected to the fiery assaults of the unpitying sceptics. So off they went, and their places were filled by the disciples of Mr. Abner Kneeland, who have fought the good fight with varying fortunes from that day to this. But now the victory is no longer doubtful; in an open field, and with fair play, truth's triumphs are certain.

Perhaps I ought not to omit informing your readers how the expenses of those meetings were met. At first the manager tried the voluntary plan. But a few months' trial convinced him that, though the dancers were always ready, and generally numerous enough, still, when the hat went round, and its contents were examined, the fiddler's face became sadly elongated, and, as that feeling can be better imagined than described, he in the most affectionate manner on a Sunday afternoon asked the audience then and there assembled if they were willing to submit to a tax of five cents at the door, instead of the continuation of the vulgar and plebeian habit of passing the hat on the Lord's day. To their everlasting honor be it recorded, when it was put to vote, they with modest and unassuming piety answered, "Yea!" Thus the Sunday Institute was divorced from that fearful and humiliating scourge of free meetings, poverty. It is a sad sight even now, in Boston, to have donation boxes for voluntary contributions to defray the expenses of a hall for a body of men who, for learning and ability, have no superiors in this or perhaps any other country,—men, at the mere announcement of whose names the hands of the listeners to their lectures ought to fly into their pockets with the modest eagerness to pay all expenses incidental to the "feast of reason and flow of soul" so cheerfully and ably provided for them. But the age of chivalry is not gone, I hope; in the good time coming, the morally brave will be as ready to pay as they enter as Edmund Burke said the physically courageous were to defend the life of the unfortunate Marie Antoinette.

But I must return to the institute, and unfold its mode of operation and the character of the questions discussed. It was always the rule of the meeting to have questions put forward that were agitating the public minds, and to invite all whose sympathies were in harmony to enter freely and take part in the proceedings; providing, however, they could do so with ability and decorum. It must be admitted that many able and candid men availed themselves of the invitation, and performed their duty in a manner creditable to themselves and instructive to those who heard them.

Men in almost every rank of life have taken an active part in those free meetings, from the humble disciple of Blackstone to his superior the judge on the bench. Of clergy and lay members we had our share; and one reverend brother of the Unitarian "persuasion" who, if he had remained long enough with us, would most certainly have been a bright and shining light (I mean Brother John, of Still River), has the respect and esteem of every member of the old Sunday Institute. May his shadow never be less! But the main stay or backbone of our institution has been chiefly drawn from the hard-working sons of toil, who through evil and good report have done their duty and improved their minds in a manner that others ought to emulate.

Men frequently ask if those meetings, so radical in character, have met with no opposition from the press or clergy. The press generally has given us a severe letting-alone, though now and then a straggling son of Faustus lets the light of his countenance shine upon us, makes his maiden speech, and then peaceably withdraws; but whether ashamed of us or ashamed of himself he allows us to conjecture. Still the same untiring quill-driver will give with distressing minuteness all the particulars of a street brawl, or the idle gossip of a band of pot-house politicians, while free meetings he lacks the courage to speak of as they are.

At another time, with your permission, I shall narrate what the clergy say of us, and how we were brought into good-natured conflict with a large number of the pious brethren of the Old South. R. B.

HUMAN SACRIFICE.

In a letter to the Telegraph, from the scene of the Ashantee war, is an account of the recruits to the British forces obtained on the Bonny, which furnishes the following sketch of the revolting practice of sacrificing human beings which still prevails to some extent among them:—

"'And yet they are cannibals,' you exclaim. I fear it is a true charge, not of the Prince or his lieutenant, of course, but of their men. For fear of a terrible outcry from the 'man and brother' party, I hasten to explain in what measure our Bonny recruits practice the deplorable habit of eating people. Cannibalism is with them a religious custom. For aught known to my informant—Captain Nicol of the Hampshire militia—it may be to the great mass of Bonny believers as offensive and as painful to observe as the Syllabus to many Liberal Catholics; but there is the fetish man, there his command, and it is duty to obey. The Bonnys, it appears, have three great Ju-jus, or hidden powers. First comes the yam Ju-ju, whose influence decides the harvest; to him is sacrificed each year, at the recurrence of the yam crop, a human being, generally a prisoner. His head is cut off, without torture, and that, with other sacred fragments, is hung in the temple till next year brings another victim. Then comes the war Ju-ju, who is invoked at the declaration of hostilities, and propitiated from time to time by human sacrifice, with the same ceremonies. Last comes the white man's Ju-ju, who has trade in charge. His victim is a young Albino girl, a class common on that coast. After selection, at the appointed time of year, the child is given some weeks of unlimited indulgence, being regarded as sacred. She is conducted in procession, every day, through the markets and the town, bearing a white wand. With this she is encouraged to point at anything that strikes her fancy, the which is immediately seized by attendant priests and confiscated for the Ju-ju's service. When the time comes, the child is put into a canoe very secretly and cast overboard at the bar of the river, thus propitiating the deity who has it in his power to upset the white man's boats when coming to trade. Her poor little body thus escapes the fate of her fellow-victims, who are devoutly eaten up by the faithful crowd. King George and his sons have done their best, by ridicule and example, to repress this yearly slaughter, and not without effect. It may safely be predicted that human sacrifice is on its last legs at Bonny."

RELIGIOUS PERSONALITIES.

Some one complains that we have been unjust in saying, "even in jest," that the religious papers are more reckless and unscrupulous in their personalities than the secular newspapers. Permit us to observe that there is no jesting about it. We should not often fail in finding examples substantiating our observation, in almost any religious journal, picked up at random. For instance, we take out at random now, from a file of religious papers, and the first thing we find is a charge by the Chicago Interior (Rev. Dr. Patton, Editor) that "Free Frothingham talks favorably of free love. He thinks it will make married life a continual courtship." And the reverend doctor, after disposing of the character of his reverend brother whose doxy is not his doxy in this airy alliterative style, continues facetiously: "Now let us hear from Oliver Johnson, of the Christian Union," intimating that this editor of a rival religious paper will probably "see Frothingham and go him one better,"—if the reverend doctor will permit us to use a technicality of a sinful game which he probably does not understand. Now comes Oliver Johnson, in the Christian Union (probably feeling doubt as to whether the Christian brother of the Interior will allow him to contradict the slander where it originated), and says with fine irony, "I am sure that, as a Christian, whose heart is pervaded by 'the charity that thinketh no evil,' you made the above remark respecting Mr. Frothingham with great pain, and only in the interest of morality, and that you would, with the same evidence before you, have been equally ready to credit a similar report in relation to the Rev. Dr. Adams or the Rev. Dr. Hall. You will be very glad, therefore, to be assured that the report respecting Mr. Frothingham, which you so reluctantly credited, is entirely untrue, being the invention of an unscrupulous reporter of a notoriously unscrupulous paper in this city. I speak from knowledge, having heard the sermon in which Mr. Frothingham was alleged to have uttered 'free-love' sentiments; but, as better evidence still, I send you a copy of the sermon as printed from the preacher's manuscript, begging you to read and judge for yourself. If any clergyman, of any denomination, has ever preached a discourse evincing a higher regard for the sacredness of marriage, I know not where it may be found. Anticipating and almost envying you the unalloyed satisfaction which you will experience in promptly printing this note," he remains Rev. Dr. Patton's respectfully, Oliver Johnson. Here we have one religious editor charging two of his brethren, in the most reckless manner, with entertaining the most odious doctrines, and one of these, in reply, insinuating (with very good ground, as we think) that the reverend editor knew he was uttering an infamous slander when he published the charge, and that he makes the slander simply because he does not belong to the same sect.

In another number of the Christian Union, which is also picked up at random from our files, we find the following:—

"As the Interior would not have copied the Christian Intelligencer's charge that we have 'commended with hearty eloquence and glowing rhetoric the materialistic atheism' of Mill's Autobiography if it had not too readily inferred that it was true, it will, of course, promptly and gladly inform its readers that the charge is wholly false, as we last week showed it to be. It is not pleasant to be thus misrepresented, but we can most sincerely affirm that we care for it far less on our own account than for the sake of the cause we serve, and which always suffers reproach when any of the champions, through passion or prejudice, or partisan rivalry, allow themselves to accuse us or others unjustly."

These illustrations derive additional significance from the fact that the Christian Union is notably free from such matters, by comparison with religious papers in general. In fact, the healthy liberality of its tone seems the chief ground of offence, which the brother of the Interior endeavors to occupy so as to destroy the circulation of the Union and build up that of the Interior—for these harmless doves keep a shrewd eye to the main chance, while going up and down the earth without staff or scrip.—Ohio State Journal.

CHANG AND ENG DEAD.

DETAILS OF THE CIRCUMSTANCES ATTENDING THE DEATH OF THE TWINS.

NEW YORK, January 20.—A despatch from Greensboro, N. C., announces the death of the Siamese twins on Saturday morning last. Chang was partially paralyzed last fall, since which time he has been fretful and strongly addicted to drinking liquor as a means of alleviating his sufferings. As soon as it was discovered that Chang was dead, Eng became terribly shocked and raved wildly for a while, at times exhibiting signs of great mental aberration. This attack was followed by a deadly stupor. In two hours from the death of Chang, Eng died. The deaf-mute children of the deceased express their sorrow and bereavement in the most pitiful manner.

Chang and Eng, the "Siamese twins," were born in 1811, and spent their childish days in fishing and picking up shells at a little village on the coast of Siam. They were brought to this country about forty years ago by Captain Abel Coffin, of Newburyport, and during their subsequent travels visited nearly every State in the Union and every country in Europe. After amassing a competence they settled in North Carolina, married two sisters, and both leave large families. The subject of separating them by cutting the ligature of flesh which bound them together was often discussed, and the most eminent surgeons of the world have differed as to the result of such an experiment. Dr. Nelaton maintained that it could be done; but equally noted British surgeons, after trying preliminary experiments, such as binding the ligature so as to prevent the circulation of the blood, concluded that there would be too much danger in the attempt. It was generally conceded, however, that the natural death of one of the brothers would not necessarily be followed by the death of the other, and that by promptly cutting the ligature the survivor could be saved. The fact that two hours elapsed between the deaths of these two phenomenal brothers proves that they were separate entities. There is no doubt that they thought differently, and experienced but few simultaneous sensations. Only when the ligature that bound them was pinched or pricked did they manifest simultaneous suffering. Their characters were also notably different; and one of the brothers appeared to be several years older than the other. They were Baptists, and members of a church in Surrey County, North Carolina. It is probable that the circumstances attending their death, and the peculiarities of their internal structure will be carefully examined, and some curious scientific facts may be derived therefrom.

1. A CHRISTIAN is one that believes things his reason cannot comprehend; he hopes for things which neither he nor any man alive ever saw; he labors for that which he knoweth he shall never obtain; yet, in the issue, his belief appears not to be false; his hope makes him not ashamed; his labor is not in vain.

2. He believes three to be one, and one to be three; a father not to be elder than his son; a son to be equal to his father; and one proceeding from both to be equal with both; he believing three persons in one nature, and two natures in one person.

3. He believes a virgin to be a mother of a son; and that very son of hers to be her maker. He believes him to have been shut up in a narrow room, whom heaven and earth could not contain. He believes him to have been born in time, who was and is from everlasting. He believes him to have been a weak child, carried in arms, who is the Almighty; and him once to have died, who only hath life and immortality in himself.

4. He believes the God of all grace to have been angry with one that had never offended him; and that God, that hates sin, to be reconciled to himself, though sinning continually, and never making, or being able to make, him satisfaction. He believes a most just God to have punished a most just person, and to have justified himself, though a most ungodly sinner. He believes himself freely pardoned, and yet a sufficient satisfaction was made for him.—Lord Bacon's "Theological Tracts."

CHRISTS OF TO-DAY.

BY MRS. SARAH BRIDGES HYNES.

Men do not know their Christs; they walk the crowded street
Robed like unto themselves; day after day they meet
The well-known, homeborn face, hear the familiar voice,
And no faith-visioned dove bids their dull souls rejoice,
That, unsuspected, stand,
'Neath God's anointing hand,
Their Saviors of To-day in their own Holy Land!

They wear no aureoles; unseen their thorny crown;
Hosannas hail them not; before them are cast down
No homage robes and palms; in no awed watcher's sight
Share they with prophet shapes transfiguration light;
Nor yet do sleepers see,
In lone Gethsemane,
Mid blood-sweat agonies, truth's angel ministry!

Their Judas they have known; by Peter been denied;
Felt doubting Thomas thrust rude hand in bleeding side;
At parting sacrament heard, speaking for the rest,
Some bitter question asked by loved one on their breast!
Earth's Calvaries are not
But on one sacred spot;
Her crucifixion crimes are countless and forgot!

A word of God made flesh, His Son is with us now;
'Tis this man, that, you, I,—whoe'er with fearless brow
Dares pluck the Sabbath corn, and bid the hungry eat;
Snatches dead husks away to give the living wheat;
Rebukes the Pharisee;
With true humanity
Holds fast man's brotherhood in bonds of charity!

World's scorn may compass them, and stones may be their bread;
And Pilate's mocking scroll be written o'er them dead;
Or thronged with fellowships, beloved by brave and good,
Stand infinitely sad in unguessed solitude,—
The sure Promethean pain,
Sharper than beak or chain,
Of all who with heaven's fire bring life to earth again!

And yet perchance some day, in unimagined space,
A spirit far advanced in truth's immortal grace,
With loving longing seized, to angel-guide shall say:
"Show me my Christ!" and lo, illumining the way,
Shall see the face of one
Met oft beneath the sun,
And wonder, "Is not this the carpenter's known Son?'

To whom shall answer then the bright celestial friend:
"Through death-won light divine thy vision backward send,
To fateful impulse given by this man's word or deed,
From which thy growth began, thy resurrection seed;
If his name Jesus be,
What is it unto thee?
Behold, he is thy Christ—thy true Redeemer, he!"

GLIMPSES.

THE TOTAL NUMBER of names thus far signed to the "Congressional Petition" is 2,458,—to the "Massachusetts Petition," 3,599.

THE BOARD OF ALDERMEN, in Brooklyn, N. Y., are deliberating over the propriety of taxing the property held in Greenwood Cemetery.

WE ARE GLAD to announce a new Liberal League in Auburn, Ohio,—President, John Fish; Vice-President, Barney Brown; Secretary (no name reported); Treasurer, G. W. Barnes; Executive Committee, L. A. Wick, Frank Covert, Ira Fish. This seems to be a result of Mr. B. F. Underwood's labors.

IN THE Massachusetts Senate, Jan. 28, Messrs. Aiken, of Franklin, and Parmenter and Bailey, of Middlesex, were appointed, on behalf of the Senate, to serve on the Joint Special Committee on Just and Equal Taxation throughout the Commonwealth. In the House, the Tax Commissioner was directed to compile and report the statistics relative to tax exemption in this State, bringing the report down to the present time. These facts indicate that the subject will at last receive the attention it is justly entitled to.

A MASS MEETING of the citizens of Vineland. N. J., has just adopted the following preamble and resolution: "WHEREAS, We believe that an enforced use of the Bible, or any other book, in the public schools, as a religious exercise, is contrary to the principles of civil and religious freedom; therefore, Resolved, That we request the trustees to discontinue religious exercises of every kind (the reading of the Bible included) in our public schools." What remains to do is to put this request into effective form, by presenting it, numerously signed, to the Board of Education. Resolutions are good, but action is better.

REFERRING TO Mr. Towne's "Retractation," the Dover (N. H.) Morning Star of Jan. 28 says: "The immediate occasion of his repentance seems to have been a call from Mr. Abbot for legions of radicals, armed with wrath and vengeance, to go at the spirit of Christianity, and utterly exterminate it, root and branch. His desire seems to have been for just about such spiteful, venomous men as Mr. Towne was, when," etc., etc. Is it "Christian" to bear false witness against the innocent? If the Star can point to any call for "wrath and vengeance," or any desire for "spiteful and venomous men," in anything we have said, we will repent in sackcloth and ashes, and take the next cutty-stool to Mr. Towne's.

IN THIS ISSUE we make a slight verbal change in the third of the "Demands of Liberalism," in order to obviate a danger of misconception. It has hitherto read—"We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease." The mistaken insertion of a comma after the word "sectarian," as published in the Washington Daily Morning Chronicle, makes a serious change of the meaning. As amended, it now reads—"We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease." That is what the original wording was intended to mean; and no true American will, we think, object to the principle that underlies it.

A NEW LIBERAL LEAGUE has just been formed in Washington, D. C., of which the officers are these: President, George M. Wood; Vice-Presid nt, George Holmes; Secretary, Mrs. J. E. Crawford; Treasurer, W. H. Burr. The character of these officers is a guarantee of vigorous and effective work; and fifty-five names are already enrolled on the list of membership. The platform of the new League is the "Demands of Liberalism;" which the National Republican of that city characterizes as a "rotten platform," adding that it is "calculated only to break down the barriers between vice and virtue, and religion and infidelity." To the League we wish a useful career of activity and influence—to the National Republican an increase of common sense.

SIGNATURES TO the "Congressional Petition" for Equal Taxation have been received at this office since last week as follows: From Jonathan Drake, Leominster, Mass., 238 names; from Charles A. Gurley, Pulaski, N. Y., 67; from S. R. Urbino, West Newton, Mass., 55; from B. S. Lewis, Boston, 3; from Amasa Willis, Taunton, Mass., 14; from E. A. Spring, Perth Amboy, N. J., 18; from I. W. Graffam, New Bedford, Mass., 27; from Robert Wade, Troy, N. Y., 87; from J. H. Ordway, Haverhill, Mass., 50; from Abel Wright, Quincy, Mass., 64; from E. S. Fellows, Quincy, Mass., 22; from S. Osgood, Georgetown, Mass., 70; from Rev. Fiske Barrett, Braintree, Mass., 75; from S. Rich and J. W. Darling, Charlton, Mass., 99. Total for the week—889 names.

SIGNATURES TO the "Massachusetts Petition" for Equal Taxation have been received at this office since last week as follows: From Jonathan Drake, Leominster, Mass., 238 names; from J. N. Darling and S. Rich, Charlton, 103; from Rev. Fiske Barrett, Braintree, 75; from C. N. Harlow, Cummington, 73; from S. R. Urbino, West Newton, 60; from Rev. G. W. Stacy, Milford, 112; from B. S. Lewis, Boston, 2; from I. W. Graffam, New Bedford, 12; from W. H. Eliot, Taunton, 16; from Edwin Hosmer, 44; from R. J. Reeby, Worcester, 64; from Mrs. M. L. Reed, Worcester, 16; from J. H. Ordway, Haverhill, 54; from I. P. Greenleaf, Boston, 17; from E. S. Fellows, Quincy, 22; from Abel Wright, Quincy, 67; from S. Osgood, Georgetown, 70; from Isaac Childs, Lynn, 68; from C. W. Estabrook, Worcester, 89; from Emory Gage, Athol, 96. Total for the week—1,298 names.

IN Old and New for February, 1874, we find the following astounding assertions: "Mr. Josiah P. Quincy's papers in Old and New, on the Present System of Exempting Public Institutions from Taxation, have led public opinion on the subject, and have directly or indirectly aroused a considerable movement both for and against such exemption, including such phenomena as the recent discussion of the 'Free Religionists,' so-called, the elaborate declaration and call of the Baptist clergymen of New Jersey, the petitions to the Massachusetts Legislature for discontinuing such exemption, etc." This ridiculous attempt to gobble up the glory (such as it is!) of the present wide-spread agitation of the church-taxation question is simply absurd. The real cause of this agitation is to be found in the American principle of the separation of Church and State, the irresistible logic of free institutions, the growing influence upon the public mind of a National Constitution which declares that Congress shall "make no law respecting an establishment of religion;" and this cause has operated on the public mind in many quarters, independently of any publication, to call forth a determined protest against a system of church-exemption which is practically a system of church-establishment. So far as THE INDEX is concerned, its protest against this system dates from the beginning of its career, and has no more to do with Old and New than it has with the Ashantee war. We never knew that a single word had ever been uttered in Old and New against church-exemption until its editor informed us of the fact a few weeks ago in a horse-car; while the "Demands of Liberalism" were first published in THE INDEX for April 6, 1872. The discussion on this subject at the Convention of the Free Religious Association last October, in New York city, was not in the least degree due to Old and New; and the petitions now circulating in the same general movement have not the remotest connection with it. If the editor of that periodical has the regard for truth which is attributed to him, he will at once correct the totally erroneous assertions above quoted.

"STUMBLING ON TRUTH IN THE DARK."

Rev. Mr. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, puts questions which will be best stated in his own language as follows:—

BROOKLYN, Jan. 26, 1874.

DEAR ABBOT:—

You have said a good deal from time to time about science as the only proper method of religious knowledge. For yourself you seem to have already arrived at a scientific knowledge of God. You speak of this knowledge as if it were the flower of modern scientific thought. Now what I want to know is this: Has all the religion in the world up to the present time been religion on false pretences? Have men had no reason for believing in a God of Infinite Power, and Wisdom, and Goodness? Have they only stumbled upon a great truth in the darkness? It is a strange dilemma. But I see no escape from it, if one travels by your road.

Yours truly,
J. W. CHADWICK.

1. The scientific method we regard as the only method of arriving at real knowledge of any sort, religious or otherwise. But it may be used with little or no consciousness of using it, just as the plantation-negroes of the South were unconscious of obeying musical laws, when they struck out their wild and sweet melodies. Observation and experiment, the appeal to verifiable experience taken in its largest sense (and this includes internal as well as external experience), lies at the bottom of all knowledge; and whoever has gained genuine knowledge must have built on this foundation. The religious knowledge really possessed and imparted by the great teachers of the past was no exception to this rule. Every one of them, if his total teachings are taken into account, presented ideas of God that the increased knowledge and purer religion of to-day refuse to accept without immense modifications; superstition and ignorance marred their utterances in the main, however fine and true their exceptional sayings; and the history of religious thought, like that of art or literature or politics, is a record of slow and gradual advances. But just so far as any man has taught what is known to-day to be truth, so far he has used either consciously or unconsciously, skilfully or unskilfully, the scientific method; for, if his teachings cannot be verified, it is an open question whether they are truth or not, while, if they can be verified, they are already a part of science. Mr. Chadwick would appreciate better the ground we occupy, if he should recognize that we do not look on the scientific method as sprung full-grown into being, like Minerva from Jupiter's brain, but rather, like everything else that is real, as having come to its relative maturity by degrees.

2. There is no question, then, of "religion on false pretences." Religion (we speak now only of religious beliefs) has always been a confused mass of truths and superstitions inextricably jumbled together,—the teachings of Jesus included. The truths have been won by immediate contact with Nature, by the unconsciously used method of science; the superstitions have sprung up because the ignorant never know how to stop with what they have discovered, but must forthwith proceed to create imaginations and dreams without end, which are so prolific in propagating themselves that too often the parasite eats up the tree. The task of science to-day is to sift out the truths from the superstitions, and to prove them to be truths indeed; in other words, to clarify, verify, and unify all human knowledge. It must weed out the falsities now so rank in the field of religion; it must cultivate the seeds of truth, and develop them into universally recognized scientific verities; it must give to each result so worked out its proper place in the great philosophic system which is yet to reproduce in human thought the wondrous unity of Nature. This is not to sweep aside all past religious thought as "religion on false pretences;" such extravagances may well be left to fanatics of unbelief.

3. "Have men had no reason for believing in a God of Infinite Power and Wisdom and Goodness?" Just so far as they have rested this belief on anything but reason, they have had no reason for it. If they have built on tradition, or revelation, or authority, or intuition (in the sense of a supposed special faculty distinct from reason or intellect), they have self-evidently had no reason for it. But so far as the real ground of their belief has been reason or intellect working unrecognized, while they quoted something else as its ground, they had reason for it. In this way many a man has "stumbled upon a great truth in the dark." There is no paradox or "dilemma" about it. So unskilled are people in analyzing the processes of their own minds, that they habitually mistake the true grounds of their own opinions, and the opinions are often correct, while the grounds they allege are totally insufficient. The history of science is full of cases in which men of genius have "stumbled upon great truths in the dark;" but these great truths have never done much for man till they have been brought forth into the light of verification. To-day the world wants proof, not assertion; it wants knowledge, not fancy; and if science cannot show that the belief in God, as infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, rests indeed on "reason," it will be concluded not only that men "had no reason" to believe in him, but that they have none now. Would that religious teachers perceived that in science alone is the hope of theism in the future!

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Members of the Free Religious Association are reminded that the subscription fees of many of them are now due. It is hoped that all will renew their annual subscriptions, and that many new names may be entered on the roll. One dollar is the fee for annual membership, but a larger sum will not be refused. Subscriptions may be sent to the undersigned, New Bedford, Mass., or to R. P. Hallowell, Treasurer, 89 Commercial Street, Boston, Mass.

MAX MUELLER AT WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

For some years past our consideration for Mr. Max Müller has, we confess, been decreasing; not our respect for his learning, our admiration of his literary talent, our gratitude for the service he renders to the students of the religions of the Old World, but our consideration for him as a teacher. But his late lecture, given by invitation of Dean Stanley in the nave of Westminster Abbey, contains thoughts worth pondering by Christians, and worth noting by those who have rejected Christianity; thoughts the uttering whereof in that place, and before such an assembly as he had, proves that the lecturer has preserved his intellectual independence, in spite of social adulation and literary success.

The thoughts we allude to are these: Speaking of the missionary spirit in different regions, Müller is careful to recognize its identity in them all, and to concede to it in all an equal dignity. The spirit of truth is frankly admitted in all the great faiths; and the zeal to impart the truth is held to be characteristic of the three missionary religions, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity, "between which three powers the religious battle of the future, the Holy War of mankind, will have to be fought, and is being fought at the present moment, though apparently with little effect."

"The recognition of a duty to preach the truth to every man, woman, and child" (by Buddhism) "was an idea opposed to the deepest instincts of Brahmanism; and when, at the end of the chapter on the first missions, we read the simple words of the old chronicler, 'Who would demur if the salvation of the world is at stake?' we feel at once that we move in a new world, we see the dawn of a new day, the opening of vaster horizons; we feel, for the first time in the history of the world, the beating of the great heart of humanity." Again: "The Koran breathes a different spirit: it does not invite, it rather compels, the world to come in. Yet there are passages which show that Mohammed, too, had realized the idea of humanity, and of a religion of humanity. Islām meant originally humility or devotion; and all who humbled themselves before God, and were filled with real reverence, were called Moslim." And hear this: "The religions which can boast of missionaries who left the old home of their childhood, and parted with parents and friends—never to meet again in this life—who went into the wilderness, willing to spend a life of toil among strangers, ready, if need be, to lay down their life as witnesses to the truth—the same religions" (he is speaking, remember, of Buddhism and Mohammedanism) "are rich also in those honest and intrepid inquirers who, at the bidding of the same spirit of truth, were ready to leave behind them the cherished creed of their childhood, to separate from the friends they loved best, to stand alone among men that shrug their shoulders, and ask, 'What is truth?' and to bear in silence a martyrdom more galling often than death itself."

The two missionaries chiefly eulogized by the lecturer are KABIR and NANAK, both disciples of Buddha, the latter the founder of the Sikh religion in India. "Both labored to persuade the Hindus and Mohammedans that the truly essential parts of their creeds were the same, that they ought to discard the varieties of practical detail, and the corruptions of their teachers, for the worship of the One Only Supreme, whether he were termed Allah or Vishnu." "No doubt the Vedas and other works of the ancient poets and prophets of India contain treasures of truth which ought never to be forgotten, least of all by the sons of India. The late good Bishop Cotton, in his address to the students of a missionary institution at Calcutta, advised them to use a certain hymn of the Rig-Veda in their daily prayers. Nowhere do we find stronger arguments against idolatry, nowhere has the unity of the Deity been upheld more strenuously against the errors of polytheism, than by some of the ancient sages of India."

Müller deplores the schism between the hold-backs and the progressives in the Brahma-Sāmaj. "But it is a sign of life. It augurs success rather than failure for the future. It is the same schism which St. Paul had to heal in the Church of Corinth." "If we think of the future of India and of the influence which that country has always exercised on the East, the movement of religious reform which is now going on appears to my mind the most momentous in this momentous century."

Of the Christian missions Müller says little or nothing; his incidental allusions to the temper in which they are conducted are not flattering. Of "controversial missions," as he calls them, he has no good opinion. "The difficulties are immense; the results very discouraging. Argument often produces the very opposite result of what we expected, confirming rather than shaking opinions no less erroneous, no less indefensible, than many articles of the Mohammedan or Buddhist faith."

"There never can be too much love, though there may be too much faith—particularly when it leads to the requirement of exactly the same measure of faith in others." "If Christianity is to retain its hold on Europe and America, if it is to conquer in the Holy War of the future, it must throw off its heavy armor, the helmet of brass and the coat of mail, and face the world like David, with his staff, his stones and sling. We want less of creeds, but more of trust; less of ceremony, but more of work; less of solemnity, but more of genial honesty; less of doctrine, but more of love."

These are good words, and justify the author's fine saying in this same address: "There may be times when silence is gold and speech silver; but there are times also when silence is death and speech is life."

WOUNDS OF FRIENDS.

Among the many criticisms of the Free Religious movement, especially since the New York Convention, it is pleasant to know that some are made by friends of the movement, and are written with sympathetic pens. "Faithful," says the old proverb, "are the wounds of a friend;" and so these latter criticisms are to be listened to with respect, as containing suggestions that may be of profit. One of them is made by Rev. Dr. Bartol in the closing chapter of his last fine book, The Rising Faith. It was in Dr. Bartol's parlors that the first councils were held that led to the formation of the Free Religious Association, and he himself, though never much favoring organization, has never hesitated to appear on the platform of its conventions, and publicly to express his sympathy with the general movement. He is, indeed, a part of the movement, and such a book as The Rising Faith is one of the certain and best indications of the current. For the Free Religious Association has never professed to include the whole movement within its administration and membership, much less in any way to manipulate and guide it; it has only tried, to the best of its ability, to represent it in its various aspects. Whatever, therefore, Dr. Bartol has to say of "Free Religion" deserves the most thoughtful consideration, as coming from one who stands for one phase, and a very important phase, of the Free Religious movement.

The criticism which he makes is summed up in his terse phrase, "A creed wanted," and is directed, of course, not against the general liberal movement of which I have here spoken, but against the phase of "Free Religious" thought which has appeared most prominent in conventions, or on the lecture platform, or in THE INDEX. And the phrase needs the interpretation which the essay gives it, and which is given also by Dr. Bartol's well-known and long-cherished convictions, to be correctly understood. For after battling through all his ministerial life against the imposed authority of what are popularly known in ecclesiastical history as "creeds," he has not suddenly turned about and declared himself in favor of such "creeds." No; what he really declares to be "wanted" is not a common statement of faith to be signed by all who are associated for a religious purpose, but the possession and assertion of positive beliefs and principles rather than negative ones; and probably he means also that a single church or religious society, to be helpful, must be based at least on the tacit affirmation of certain spiritual instincts and aspirations, and not be merely a miscellaneous body for the critical discussion of religious questions. But the point that he specially emphasizes is that the single assertion of the principle of mental liberty, leading to negative criticism only, is not enough for profitable religious association; liberty is only a condition, and the proclamation of positive ideas must be the end; at least, "the religious sentiment" must be assumed, without which "there is no union among men," and the natural utterance of which is affirmative and creative.

And the criticism, "A creed wanted," when thus interpreted, is made by others who are more or less interested in the Free Religious Association,—by a number of younger men who have been or are members of it. They put the criticism thus,—that the word "religious" in the name of the Association does not get so much emphasis in the Association's public work as does the word "Free," while, arguing from the name alone, it should at least have equal emphasis; and some of them think that it should have more,—that the battle for religious liberty has practically been fought and won, and that now the primary aim should be to cultivate religion in the free conditions accorded to it. On this latter point, a good deal might be said to show that much is yet to be done before liberty is fully secured in the domain of religion. Those who have been accustomed to think and act in a liberal religious atmosphere can hardly understand, perhaps, how the spirit of dogmatism and sectarianism still tyrannizes in some denominations and communities. But not stopping now to argue this point, the question may be asked of those who make this criticism of unequal or incorrect emphasis, How is the right emphasis to be effected? It may be safely said that none of them would propose for the purpose any statement of common religious convictions, for they are as much opposed as any one to the creed-principle; nor, so far as I have heard, do they suggest any change in the Constitution of the Free Religious Association; they believe in the unlimited mental liberty, in respect to religion, which it expresses. The different emphasis, therefore, it would seem, must be given in directing the work of the Association by those who happen at any time to be its executive officers, and by individuals in their own special work, whatever it may be.

But, in either case, it comes to the question of individual emphasis. For the work of the Association, in accordance with the idea already stated, has not been of the kind which seeks to manipulate and guide a movement. It is representative rather than directive. It offers an opportunity by which earnest individual thinkers, of various antecedents and various phases of faith, may come together for the free utterance of views on the vital religious problems of the age,—trusting that thought cannot thus meet thought on these profound themes without evolving a positive and creative force. Except, therefore, in the selection of topics—and these, I think it will be agreed, have been various, and capable of a positive as well as a negative treatment—the executive officers of the Association have had little to do in determining this matter of emphasis. It is determined by the individual speaker or writer. And here it is possible these friendly critics do not make a needed discrimination between work done by individuals in conventions of the Free Religious Association and work done by the same persons in their more special spheres of labor. All public conventions about religion, whether held by radicals or conservatives, are more likely to fall into the critical than the creative mood. I honestly think that the Free Religious meetings will bear comparison in this respect very well with the general conventions of other religious organizations. And how large a part of the religious newspapers is given up to theological and sectarian discussions! They talk about religion, but the words in them are rare that are really religiously uplifting and creative. Can the first stone be cast at THE INDEX in this matter? Moreover, the Free Religious Association offers a platform only two or three times a year; and even though on these occasions the exigencies of a general public convention should appear to throw the emphasis more upon the idea of liberty than upon that of religion, it would not necessarily follow that this would be the emphasis in the ordinary, every-day work of the individuals participating in it. Hear Messrs. Frothingham, Weiss, Longfellow, Gannett, in the pulpit on any Sunday of the year, and then decide if the religious sentiment be wanting in their utterance, or if they have no positive beliefs to urge.

Free Religion must be judged not by its utterances on special occasion in public conventions, but by its out-come in the entire work of its individual adherents.

Still, while considerations like these are not perhaps sufficiently allowed for by our friendly critics, there is, I think, a point in their criticism that deserves attention. It is this. The Free Religious movement attracts liberal-minded people of all shades of thinking—even those who have been accustomed to regard all religion as superstition. And this is one of its legitimate attractions,—for these persons have some testimony worth hearing, and it is one of the phenomena which religious thinkers ought to explain, that there are and have been so many persons of clear intellects and the purest morals who deny the value of religion. Now in the laudable desire to give this class of persons the rights of fellowship to which they are entitled by character, there is doubtless a temptation on the part of others, springing from a feeling of courtesy and supposed respect, and acting almost unconsciously, to suppress the utterance of some of their own positive sentiments and convictions, which these persons, it is thought, cannot endorse or perhaps understand. But all such suppression of real belief is certainly an evil, and, were it to become common, would maim the Free Religious movement rather than help it forward. True freedom demands that every earnest and mature conviction, every sincere feeling (with a proper regard, of course, to place, and time, and manner) shall have a right to utterance, not that there shall be repression from fear of offending the judgment or hurting the feelings of others. Where there is genuine freedom, such offence cannot be given. And science no less than freedom demands that in the perfect fellowship all earnest sentiment and sentiments shall have utterance,—else how shall the truth be established? If we believe, therefore, in Theism, in a Personal Providence, in Immortality, in Prayer, and the like, and believe that these beliefs are very important to the well-being of mankind, let us so say and act, and urge them with all our power. Liberty is not infringed so long as we accord to others who do not thus believe the same right of utterance. And this certainly is the idea of the Free Religious Association,—the utterance of individual convictions, not their suppression: the natural harmony that will result from the freest and largest expression of thought, not a poor, artificial fellowship on the meagre residuum of thought that would be found after all differences of opinion had been repressed into courteous silence. And a true courtesy and respect demand that we shall give an opponent our best and most genuine thought, and not seem merely to echo his own.

In another article I may have something to say of another criticism, made by a friend and member of the Association, concerning its attitude towards questions of Social Reform.

BISHOP FERRETTE'S LECTURES.

Bishop Ferrette makes a new and valuable contribution to our knowledge of the East, and its political and social condition, by his lectures, which are both highly instructive and entertaining.

It is a rare opportunity to hear the views of a man who to fine scholarly culture adds the rare experience of many years spent among these people, with the peculiar opportunities which his clerical position gave him. Added to this is the interesting circumstance that, having become entirely liberal in his religious views since his residence in this country, he looks with impartial and just discrimination upon the claims of the different religious sects who hold sway in the various dependencies of the Turkish Empire. His lecture on the political condition of the Christians of the East, given on Wednesday last, at the New England Woman's Club Rooms in Tremont Place, was so full of clear statement of the present political condition of those countries, of suggestive interpretations of great historical changes, and of lively dramatic illustrations, that he held the unbroken attention of his audience for more than an hour; and I for one felt the desire to hear it over again, that I might the more thoroughly weigh the important considerations which he suggested, and follow up the vitstas of thought which he opened.

He is clear and decided in his political as well as his religious views, but seems to have the rare power of looking at his subjects from an independent point of view, and so does justice even to those with whom he does not sympathize.

He is also a fine teacher of languages, and some of our learned friends find his Greek lessons full of interest and instruction.

VERSES BY H. H. New and Enlarged Edition. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

Since the days of poor "L. E. L.," no woman has sailed into fame under a flag inscribed with her initials only, until the days of "H. H." Here, however, the parallelism ceases; for the fresh, strong beauty which pervades these Verses has nothing in common with the rather languid sweetness of the earlier writer. Unless I am much mistaken, this enlarged volume—double the size of that originally issued—will place its author not merely above all American poetesses and all living English poetesses, but above all women who have ever written poetry in the English language, except Mrs. Browning alone. "H. H." has not yet proved herself equal to Mrs. Browning in range of imagination, but in strength and depth the American writer is quite the equal of the English, and in compactness and symmetry altogether her superior. Compared with the living, "H. H." must be pronounced superior to Jean Ingelow, and very far superior to Christina Rossetti. What Mrs. Julia Ward Howe might have accomplished in poetry, had she concentrated herself seriously upon it, no one can say; but it is clear that, amid the multifarious interests of her later life, she has failed to mature the extraordinary poetic gifts she showed.

Indeed there is no need of making limitations of sex in regard to "H. H." She first came forward in literature less than ten years ago; and I can think of no man who has made himself known, within that time, in American poetry, who can be ranked as her equal, unless it be Harte. And though Harte has struck a few chords of great dramatic power in his poems, yet his fame will live chiefly through his half-dozen stories; while the essential feebleness of Howell's volume of poems removes him from the competition. Joaquin Miller I cannot regard as worthy of entering the lists beside "H. H.,"—unless, indeed, we have made up our mind to accept all our opinions from England, and have no standard of our own,—and, if so, it may fairly be said that she outranks, with one exception, all American poets who have come into notice since the war of the rebellion. It would not have been safe to say this on appearance of her first thin volume; but the bolder efforts and higher finish of the enlarged edition justify this assertion.

As now arranged, these Verses may be classified under the following heads:—

First: Odes, or poems in the form of odes. These are "A Christmas Symphony," "Resurgam," and "A Funeral March." These are all added since the original volume, and are longer and more elaborate in structure than anything which there appeared. They are as rich in thought as Wordsworth's odes; deal, like his, with the loftiest themes of life and death; and, like his, have a stately and rhythmical utterance, here and there disfigured by a halting or prosaic line, as if the meaning sometimes weighed down the chords too heavily. There has been nothing of the kind to equal them in our literature, except Lowell's "Commemoration Ode," at Cambridge.

Second: Poems of Passion. Mrs. Browning's "Sonnets from the Portuguese" are not more absorbed and thrilling in their emotion than are these; and Robert Browning's "Men and Women" does not let down the plummet of words into greater depths of feeling. They range in form from the more deliberate and meditative character of "Love's Largess" and "Feast" to the glee and triumph of "Land," or the almost mystical and altogether beautiful symbolism of "Noon" and "Vintage." It is a comfort to feel, in an age of science, that human emotion can still be made as essentially ideal a thing as in the days of Petrarch.

Third: Poems marked by peculiarly artistic structure. Of these, the "Gondolieds" stands undoubtedly at the head: but the "Christmas Eve at St. Peter's" has the same quality. To this class belong also the Sonnets; the chief of which have a crystallized perfection of form which is the rarest thing in our literature. Chief of these are "Burnt Ships," "Ariadne's Farewell," "Her Eyes," and "Thought." This last is understood to be Mr. Emerson's favorite among the Verses; he has read it in his public readings, and is said also to carry it about in his pocket, to be privately administered to those found worthy.

Fifth: Religious Poems; usually less original or profound in thought than these last, but essentially earnest and sincere: and probably the most popular of all the poems. By far the best of these, I should say, is "Spinning," which is singularly tender and complete. Other popular favorites are "My Legacy," which really ranks with Vaughan and Herbert,—"Our Angels," "Best," "When the Baby Died," &c. There is a remarkable poem called "Doubt," which gives a useful lesson to all reformers.

Sixth: Poems on Nature. In these the author prefers the measure which Andrew Marvell and Emerson have specially appropriated for such themes. In delicate observation and "sympathetic penetration" with all forms of Nature, her poems rank with theirs, and take some added fineness from a woman's heart. In this measure are written "My Strawberry," "My Hickory Fire," "Form," "Distance," and others. But there is one, "Locusts and Wild Honey," that has a metre of its own, which proves quite as effective. Indeed "H. H." is fond of creating metres—sometimes almost too daring—but she keeps their laws when made, and allows herself far less laxity than Mrs. Browning as to rhyme, accent and even grammar.

Seventh; Her ballads should be enumerated, which are less triumphantly successful than any other class of her Verses, unless "Coronation" be excepted, which has much beauty and originality.

The best compliment that can be paid to these poems is this careful enumeration. Here are six if not seven separate departments of poetry in which this writer has excelled. It is a great deal; eminence has heretofore been won, especially in America, by excellence in any one of them. It is not that "H. H." has yet attained perfection in her art; she still has occasional roughnesses and strainings of expression or sound; and there is occasional obscurity; but it is almost always that kind of obscurity which is, as Coleridge said, "a compliment to the reader"—the expression only seeming difficult because the thought or feeling is profound. Such obscurity, once understood, is a delight. Thus one of these poems called "Love's Rich and Poor" has been several times criticised as obscure. Yet the thought is simple enough,—that some natures are far more richly endowed than others with the capacity of loving, so that they give more than they receive; while those poor in the capacity of loving may yet have love lavishly heaped upon them and give back almost nothing in return. A poem that thus demands thought and feeling in its reader is like the poems of Emerson, or like Browning's "Men and Women," which, when once comprehended, yields far more permanent satisfaction than Longfellow's smooth and graceful commonplaces. And most of these Verses hit the golden mean, and are easily intelligible, yet not easily exhaustible.

It is understood that the author of these poems is spending the present winter in Colorado, for the restoration of her health. Many hearts will follow her, and all who have the honor of our literature at heart will wish for her safe return.

THE NEW LIBERAL MOVEMENT IN WALTHAM.

WALTHAM, Mass., Jan. 21, 1874.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I think you will like to hear of the success of the Liberal Lectures in Waltham on Sunday evenings.

Thus far we have had eight, two of which were given without charge to the Association. An admission fee of twenty-five cents was paid, but the committee was authorized to give away tickets at discretion, as Waltham was bearing a full share of the financial distress.

Our list of workers was hardly enrolled when the "panic" opened; and it was taken for granted by the public that in our inexperience we should beat a retreat from the lecture field, as the Rumford Institute, the oldest lyceum in the country, did with its course of popular lectures.

Certain pious ones expressed a wish to hear our lectures, if they were on any other than Sunday evening. They could not see why we were not eager for the larger audience and receipts that would then come in. You will smile that, ten miles from the "Hub," they have not yet learned that the first day must be as free as the other six.

We who have listened to Mr. Weiss' "Act of Faith," your lecture on "The Coming Religion," Mr. Alger's "Steps toward Religious Emancipation," Mr. Frothingham's "Soul of Protestantism," and Mr. Gunning's "Religion in Darwinism," all of which came in our course, feel that we have maintained our right to do one sort of work, at least, on the first day.

My home duties keep me so secluded that I may not gauge correctly the amount of influence set in motion by the lectures; but I can't help inferring from the sour glances from certain sectarian quarters that they have experienced a counter current, and I hear also of occasional pulpit estimates, based as usual on perfect ignorance of our lecturers and their subjects. The influence on the Liberals themselves is most encouraging; it has kindled some life in the most apathetic.

We are not fully decided in what way to continue our work. The point of union now made must be maintained. In effect we have a Liberal League, and anti-exemption petitions are in circulation. A subscription list is also opened for THE INDEX.

It is a good thing to find out what a handful of Liberals can do, if they are willing to work. The spirit of freedom is slow to come, unless the way is prepared.

Yours very truly,

M. F. G.,

Secretary of the Liberal Lecture Association.

THE DRED SCOTT CASE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

If your correspondent, P. Fisk, is not a lawyer, as I conclude he is not, and if, as it appears, he resides in Boston, where there are so many learned lawyers, he should have inquired of one of them whether, in my brief communication to THE INDEX relative to the Dred Scott decision, I really committed the grievous errors he imputes to me. Had he done so, he would have learned that my statements were correct in every particular, and would have escaped the unenviable predicament in which he has seen fit to place himself before the public. The decision is reported in the 19th Howard's Reports, beginning at page 393. The title of the cause is Dred Scott v. John F. A. Sandford. It was an action of trespass, vi et armis, for restraining the plaintiff of his liberty as a slave, instituted in the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Missouri. Under the instructions of the court as to the law, the jury found a verdict for the defendant, upon which a judgment was rendered by the court. The plaintiff, Scott, brought a writ of error to the Supreme Court to reverse this decision. The case had excited a lively public interest, and was argued twice before the Supreme Court,—that Court having directed a re-argument. The judgment of the Circuit Court was "reversed, and a mandate issued, directing the suit to be dismissed for want of jurisdiction." It was therefore in favor of the plaintiff, Scott, as I rather parenthetically observed in my communication.

Now as to my allegation that Chief Justice Taney did not assert that negroes "had no rights which the white man was bound to respect." On this point I am obliged to trouble you with a brief quotation from the opinion of the court as delivered by Chief Justice Taney. [See the report on p. 407.]

"It is difficult at this day to realize the state of public opinion, in relation to that unfortunate race, which prevailed in the civilized and enlightened portions of the world at the time of the Declaration of Independence, and when the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted. But the public history of every European nation displays it in a manner too plain to be mistaken. They had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; and so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect; and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit. He was bought and sold, and treated as an ordinary article of merchandise and traffic, whenever a profit could be made by it. . . . And in no nation was this opinion more firmly fixed or more uniformly acted upon than by the English Government and English people. They not only seized them on the coast of Africa, and sold or held them in slavery for their own use, but they took them as ordinary articles of merchandise to every country where they could make a profit on them, and were far more extensively engaged in this commerce than any other nation in the world. The opinion thus entertained and acted upon in England was naturally impressed upon the colonies they founded on this side of the Atlantic."

In conclusion, I leave your readers to decide whether Mr. P. Fisk or I is chargeable with never having read the decision in question, and which of us "is one of the Rip Van Winkles who refuse to wake up." I say your readers, for I have no hope of enlightening Mr. P. Fisk. He is obviously too far gone for that.

ALFRED CONKLING.

CHRISTIANITY AND FREE RELIGION.

Cannot some one get out a supplement to Worcester's or Webster's Dictionary giving a modern definition of Christianity? At present there seems to be as many definitions as there are individuals, and yet the axe of the executioner is ready to strike off the head of any one who cannot stand the test of some sectarian shibboleth.

If one is not a Christian after the pattern or mould of some sect, what is he? Unchristian?

An editorial in the Liberal Christian of Jan. 3, on the subject of "Evolution and Revolution in Religion," defines Unitarianism. After reading the article, the question came to my mind: Are Unitarians really Christians, or, rather, would they be counted as such by the majority of professing Christians of the present day?

The Liberal Christian tell us that "the office of Unitarianism is to present in a definite way what is left, after the old errors and traditions are cleared away, of the original gospel; it is to show what Christianity is and requires and bestows, when stripped and separated from mere clerical and ecclesiastical authority. It is to prove that Christianity, in its essential form and beauty, survives the downfall and removal of the artificial creed of Christendom, and has power to sustain the soul, to lift the reason in worship, to subdue the conscience to duty, to unite the heart to humanity, to make men real, self-sacrificing followers of Christ in their devotion to the practical holiness of each and the good of all."

Now before we turn to the principles of Free Religion, let us first note what the Liberal Christian would "strip and separate" from Christianity. Turning to the same editorial, the following, referring to old Christianity, appears: "Men of spotless life were tried for heresy, which was any departure from the opinions received in their old communion. . . . A general agreement existed in the denunciation of reason in matters of faith. The word infidel was thrown at every independent seeker of truth, no matter how honestly or reverently he might pursue it. Above all, Christian preaching was then almost wholly a matter of doctrinal argument. Certain settled and received theological opinions—the fall of Adam, the total depravity of man, his impotency of his own will to repent, the election of a certain number to that distinction, the signs of a true conversion, the efficacy of Christ's blood, the personality of the Holy Ghost, the omnipresence and almost omnipotence of the devil, the uselessness of morality as any claim on God's acceptance, called the 'deadness of works,' salvation wholly by faith, the intrinsic merits of believing things hard and self-contradicting—these were always the underlying ideas and the usual topics of the pulpit." The Liberal Christian adds that "it is hardly necessary at the present day to do more than call attention to the all-but-universal disappearance of these rules and customs and ideas, to prove how immense, how immeasurable, and unexampled in extent and rapidity the changes in theological opinions and religious feeling have been."

Let us now turn to some of the affirmations and principles of Free Religion, as expressed in the Truths for the Times, and see if we do not get at about the same result in different language:—

"The Protestant Reformation was the birth of Free Religion — the beginning of the religious protest against authority within the confines of the Christian Church. . . . As love of freedom increases, reverence for authority decreases."

"Free Religion is emancipation from the outward law, and voluntary obedience to the inward law."

"The great faith or moving power of Free Religion is faith in man as a progressive being. . . . The great ideal end, the perfection and complete development of man. . . . The great practical means, the integral, continuous, and universal education of man."

"The great law of Free Religion is the still, small voice of the private soul."

"The great peace of Free Religion is spiritual oneness with the Infinite One."

"Free Religion is the natural outcome of every historical religion—the final unity, therefore, towards which all historical religions slowly tend."

It is frequently said that Free Religion consists chiefly of negations; that its positive elements are too ideal for practical life, and that there is no common ground upon which to meet. In reply to that, I again quote from the "Modern Principles," or synopsis of Free Religion, in the same tract, Truths for the Times:—

"The unity of character requires that the conscience shall govern all personal action by absolute and universal moral ideas (truthfulness, justice, benevolence, purity, honor, integrity, self-respect); and that it shall make the welfare of all a private duty to each, thus consecrating the private life to the public good."

"That the affections shall irradiate life in all its relations with the splendor of unselfish love; that they shall make manhood more manly, and womanhood more womanly, by blending them in one pure and happy home; that they shall dignify existence with noble friendships; that they shall deepen the joy and lighten the grief of others by respectful and tender sympathy; that they shall reverence the good and pity the evil in every human soul, and broaden out into a mighty and self-forgetful love of universal man."

Is there anything Christian in the above? Mr. Potter has said in substance that he is not a Christian after the manner of olden Orthodoxy, and straightway the Liberal (?) Christian discovers in him "a seeming want of independence," that he should be willing to allow his name to remain among old associates who, I have shown, have renounced full as much of the old faith as he.

The Liberal Christian refers to Channing as a Christian. What sort of a Christian was he? That is the way we must put the question in future.

Free Religionists remember that Channing said not long before his death: "I hope nothing from an increased zeal in urging an imperfect, decaying form of Christianity. One higher, clearer view of religion in a single mind encourages me more than the organization of millions to repeat what has been repeated for ages with little effect."

But it matters not what Channing said. Some forms of religion have to be supported by authorities, or they totter and fall. But how about that which might be called Natural Religion? Has that inherent strength, and can it in the name of humanity "stand up and walk"?

I define this Natural Religion of the universe as "the attraction of the finite to the Infinite," the animating and inspiring effect of this attraction being manifest in "the effort of man to perfect himself."

It is a perpetual magnet, drawing us upward and onward if we will but listen to the voice within.

This religion needs not the support of authorities. It renews its strength daily; it recommends itself to us hourly. The fact that our aspirations are for something higher, purer, nobler, is proof that there is a conscious relation to something better, call that better what you will; to me it is an Infinite Power. He who feels not this attraction, prompting him to effort, not all the blood of Calvary can help him; yet he who is conscious of it needs not a mediator; he is his own ambassador, his communication direct. And this I call the Rising Faith of this generation. This power will lead men to just such acts of love and self-sacrifice as any recorded of the Christ of the Christians, and they will do it, not for "Jesus' sake," or because he did it, but for humanity's sake, and because the voice within and the enlightened reason approve it.

To rely upon the same spirit which animated Jesus, Plato, Socrates, and many others, is true faith as well as freedom, and will carry men onward; but to tarry behind, calling Lord, Lord, Christian, Christian, and expecting to be saved in some vicarious way, is the letter which is killing or causing the disintegration of the Church.

And what is Free Religion but freedom from dogma, freedom to press onward in all that is pure and elevating, untrammelled by the errors of the past,—yet using the history of the past for all it can teach us, thankful that, if it was the lot of man to stumble and fall many times in his upward steps, we have at least the record of it, to warn us of like dangers.

Of all evils which history records, none seems to have brought more misery and bloodshed than spiritual arrogance, coupled with love of power. When Christianity is stripped of all this, I claim that there will be nothing but Free Religion left.

What I wish to know is, how far that which was once called Christianity can be stripped of its special or distinctive features, and yet be entitled to the name of Christian.

Whether all that the theologian has fastened to Christianity in the past was the logical result of the teachings of Christ and his disciples or not, the fact remains that the dogmas which are now rejected were about all that gave it its distinctive features.

Of how much more importance is it that we should be animated by the same spirit that infused such energy and courage into the character of the Nazarene? He thought and acted with little reference to old authorities, and encouraged his followers to be a law unto themselves. "Why judge ye not of yourselves what is right?" is the question now as it was then.

Jesus assured his followers that the spirit of truth would guide them, as it had him; that it was all he relied upon, the universal spirit, older than Abraham, to give him utterance.

There was nothing special or distinctive in this; many others, before and since Jesus' time, having felt this mysterious prompting from an unseen Power.

There was absolutely nothing new in the moral teachings of Jesus, the brotherhood of man, and the principles of the Golden Rule having been laid down centuries before the Christian era.

I would gladly bear the name of Christian, did I not believe that Free Religion comprehends it all, and more.

Regarding authentic miracles (so-called) in the past, such as the raising of the apparently dead, the healing of the sick by laying on of hands, or other simple means; unharmed contact with poisons, movement of physical objects without visible instrumentality, etc., there has been in all ages testimony of like nature regarding others, and science is now demonstrating that all this is done in harmony with universal laws, and can be, and is, repeated under suitable conditions.

Yet mention well attested facts of this nature in our own day to some ecclesiastical high priest, and he will at once account for it by referring to that omnipotent and omnipresent devil. And so, in Jesus' time, it was to Beelzebub, the prince of devils, that they ascribed his power. The healing power is becoming more common, and better understood each year. Who can tell what this century will yet disclose in spiritual as well as physical science? Christianity seems to have lost its specific definition, for in the hands of sectarians it means anything and every thing.

I could get a much clearer idea of an individual, if told that such a one was a true man, or a true woman, than if told, a Christian gentleman, or a Christian lady. "What sort of a Christian?" would be my next question. But if told that they were Christ-like, then I should understand and love them.

Religion, on the contrary, is no vague element to me. The "attraction" to something higher, purer, and better, is the mainspring of our lives, ever prompting us to "effort." This to me is religion; and Free Religion is freedom from all that would hold us back to the superstitions of the past.

Viewed in this light, how superficial, how trifling, in the face of the stern realities of life, to put the test of doctrine and dogma, when character alone should be the standard of true worth?

Substituting the word religion for union, the words of Webster come sounding in my ears: "Not liberty first and religion afterwards, but liberty and religion, now and forever, one and inseparable."

A DEBATE IN INDIANA.

ZIONSVILLE, Ind., Jan. 14, 1874.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir.—We of the little town of Zionsville have just passed through a week of the most intense interest. Some time back, the Rev. W. R. Jewell, of the "Christian" Church, a man of considerable ability, and thought by some to be the ablest debater in this State, threw out a challenge to discuss the subjects of Christianity and Materialism, under the following propositions:—

Affirmed by Mr. Jewell that the doctrines taught in the New Testament, when believed and obeyed, have the greatest influence over mankind for good.

Affirmed by Mr. Underwood that modern Materialism is more reasonable, consistent, and ennobling than Christianity.

Mr. Underwood, being written to, agreed to meet Mr. Jewell, and on the sixth day of January, 1874, made his appearance. The debate commenced on the evening of the sixth, and ended on the tenth, and was listened to by a large and very attentive audience.

When Mr. Underwood arrived, some of the people expected he was some great monster or desperado; but notwithstanding all their prejudice against him, when he left this vicinity he carried with him the respect and good-will of a large part of the community of all classes. Throughout the entire debate, Mr. Underwood's deportment was that of the kind-hearted, dignified, and true gentleman, and won for him many friends both in and out of the churches. As to the speeches, I could not give you any account in this short letter; but many members of the churches here freely admit that Mr. Jewell was no match for Mr. Underwood. To illustrate the spirit some few persons manifested, I will add that in the midst of the debate one lady wanted a revolver to shoot Mr. Underwood in the back; one wanted him hung up by the heels for the birds to eat; while others wondered why it was that God suffered such men to live.

Since the debate is over, radicals think that free thought has gained considerable ground: and thus we see that in town after town the people are waking up to the great questions that are forcing themselves upon the attention of all.

This is the irrepressible conflict between old theories, dogmas, and superstitions, and man's enlightened reason and cultivated intellect. The old citadel of error, superstition, and ignorance is being torn down and swept aside, and an age of noble manhood and womanhood is rapidly approaching, when the religion of humanity will cover the earth as the waters do the great deep. Yours,

RADICAL.

A MISSING man was lately advertised for, and described as having a Roman nose. He won't be found. Such a nose as that will never turn up.—National Baptist.

CUSTOM HOUSE OATHS.—Mr. Anthony's bill providing that there shall be no more swearing at the custom houses, but that the declarations or affirmations of importers shall be held sufficient, is very timely. It was not brought forward a minute too soon. The swearing at custom houses has been very hard of late. Junior partners, selected for that purpose on account of their powerful constitutions and indifference to salvation, have sworn themselves black in the face over all sorts of queer invoices, and they very rightly complain about it. What is the use of putting these merely ceremonious obstructions in the way of commerce? It imperils immortal souls, takes time, and does not add a cent to the revenue. Moreover, it is a sinful waste of Bibles. Those which are employed at custom houses are understood to be brass-bound and copper-fastened—built to stand high-pressure affidavits; but even thus guarded, the swearing upon them sometimes warps the cover, and, in hardware cases, is apt to send fragments of the canonical books flying about the premises like gunwads. These inspired volumes, instead of being put to such a stress, had far better be released to purposes of missionary use and general evangelization. Properly employed they might be made instruments of good. But where they are, they tend to block trade. Many an enterprising importer would lie twice as liberally and loosely if he did not have to swear to his lie. This would enable him to make twice as much money, and he would consequently be just twice as respectable, and possibly import twice as many goods. Anything which increases the wealth and respectability of citizens, and augments the commerce of the nation, is of course desirable, and this the proposed substitution of the statement for the oath would do. Mr. Anthony is entitled to the approbation of the country for his wise and thoughtful act. There is a good deal of wear and tear of conscience involved in the importing business at the best. Why harshly and arbitrarily exact affidavits concerning the accuracy of every little bill, invoice, rescript, or what not? Under this system the swearing members of firms find their moral constitutions early undermined. If their duties involved only plain lying, they could repent along nights and Sundays, and perhaps keep somewhere within hailing distance of forgiveness and redemption. But false swearing is not so easily atoned. Perjurers never turn out well. Whether they take to lead statuary, politics, or piety, it is all the same. Their deeds follow them. It is not right to impose this ruinous obligation upon merchants, and Mr. Anthony's bill will lift it squarely off their shoulders, and eliminate the perilous affidavit from commerce.

But some of the provisions of this bill seem needlessly harsh and rigorous. It provides, for example, that the penalty of a false affirmation shall be the same as that incurred by a false oath. Why not omit penalties altogether? The general effect of the bill, stripped of its punitory clauses, is to meet that common and rational desire to get the best of the Government which seems so general among importers, and at the same time to save their morals and protect their piety as far as possible. This is a worthy purpose, and it should not be vitiated by the pretence of putting the oath and the declaration on the same moral footing, or the proposal to visit their infraction with equal penalties.

The senator should try to make it smooth for the trader instead of casting one stone in his way while trying to take another out of it. Let him cosily pocket the fruits of dishonesty without being put through more quicksteps of falsehood than are absolutely necessary. Hitherto so much tergiversation has apparently been required to get cargoes through the custom house lines, so much frantic kissing of copper-bottomed Bibles, and frenzied rushing through of double invoices, that anything which simplifies these tangled procedures, or circumscribes the mendacity of those who perspire therein will be a public boon and blessing. So, let the senator revise his bill, inserting the generous provision that everybody may affirm whatever he likes without dread of penalty or without reference to its truth. Then let him peg away till he gets his clever little statute enacted, and all dishonest importers, and tender-minded custom house brokers, and evangelical entry clerks will with one accord rise up and call him blessed. And Dodge, Jr., shall vote the sedate yet gallant senator from Rhode Island an honorary member of the Young Men's Christian Association, which will thus both renew and reform his youth.—Correspondent N. Y. World.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY.

EVERY SATURDAY.

The Atlantic, for 1874, begins its thirty-third volume under the most prosperous auspices. The new publishers will spare no pains to keep it the Leading American Magazine, containing the fresh writings of Longfellow, Lowell, Aldrich, Parton, Whittier, Howells, Warner, Owen, Holmes, Bayard Taylor, Wells, Eggleston, with able criticisms upon current literature, art, and science.

Prudence Palfrey, a delightful novel by T. B. Aldrich, is begun in the January number, and

A Serial Story, by W. D. Howells, will begin in an early number.

Personal Reminiscences, by J. G. Whittier, will cover an eventful period in our history, and Life in the Confederate States, by a Confederate, will be an inside view of recent history.

Charles Dudley Warner's Saunterings in the British Provinces will be continued in subsequent numbers.

Robert Dale Owen's Autobiography, which has attracted so much attention, will be resumed, and chapters of peculiar interest will appear.

Local Taxation in the United States, the article in the first number by David A. Wells, will be followed by others from the same hand, on questions of Finance and Political Economy,

And there is every promise of the ablest and most attractive volume of The Atlantic ever published.

TERMS.—Single or specimen numbers, 35 cents. Yearly subscription, $4. The Atlantic and Every Saturday ($5) sent to one address for $8.

Every Saturday, a Journal of Choice Reading (Established January, 1866).—While retaining the prominent characteristics which have long made Every Saturday a favorite journal for the Fireside and the Railway, the forthcoming series will embrace several fresh and attractive features, among which may be mentioned Original American Stories, of which the first will be a serial, entitled "His Two Wives," a story of married life, by Mary Clemmer Ames, and a new Editorial Department devoted to the discussion of home literary, social, and scientific topics.

Under its new management Every Saturday will continue to lay before its readers each week the cream of the foreign weekly and monthly periodicals, giving in a compact and elegant form a larger amount and a greater variety of choice reading matter than is obtainable in any other publication of the same price.

The plan of Every Saturday embraces Serial Tales, Short Stories, Critical and Descriptive Essays, Sketches of Travel and Adventure, Poems, Biographical Papers, Papers on Popular Science, Literary Information; in fine, whatever contributes to produce a Weekly acceptable and attractive to all classes of intelligent American readers.

TERMS.—Weekly Parts, 10 cents; Monthly Parts, 50 cents; Yearly Subscription, $5.

N.B.—The Atlantic Monthly and Every Saturday sent to one address for $8.

BOSTON.

CHARLES H. DITSON & CO.,

711 Broadway, New York.

$5 TO $20 PER DAY easily made by any one. We want men, women, boys, and girls all over the country to sell our fine Steel Engravings, Chromos, Crayon Drawings, Illuminations, Photographs, etc., etc. We now publish the finest assortment ever placed before the public, and our prices are marked down so low as to defy all competition. No one subscribes for a premium-giving paper in order to get a picture, after seeing our pictures and learning our prices. We have many old agents at work for us, who have made canvassing for books, papers, etc., their business for years, and they all report that they can make much more money at work for us than at anything else. Our prices are so low that all can afford to purchase, and therefore the pictures sell at sight at almost every house. New beginners do as well as agents who have had large experience, for our beautiful subjects and low prices are appreciated by all. To make large sales everywhere all an agent has to do is to show the pictures from house to house. Don't look for work elsewhere until you have seen what great inducements we offer you to make money. We have not space to explain all here, but send us your address and we will send full particulars, free, by mail. Don't delay if you want profitable work for your leisure hours, or for your whole time. Now is the favorable time to engage in this business. Our pictures are the finest and most pleasing in this country, and are endorsed by all the leading papers, including the New York Herald. Those who cannot give the business their entire attention can work up their own localities, and make a handsome sum without ever being away from home over night. Let all who want pleasant, profitable employment, without risking capital, send us their addresses at once, and learn all about the business for themselves. Address

VOLUME 5. BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1874. WHOLE NO. 216.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE HOME of Salvini, the actor, is in Florence, Italy, where the grave of Theodore Parker is.

M. D. CONWAY says that French is the "polite language of most civilized countries" in Europe.

THE PUBLIC is encouraged to expect the speedy publication of the private correspondence and journal of Lord Macaulay.

THE LIBERAL PARTY in England has been defeated in the popular elections just held, and nothing seems left to Mr. Gladstone but to resign as its parliamentary leader.

THE REPORT of the Board of State Charities makes it appear that nearly $3,300,000 were expended in this State, last year, for the purposes of charity, reform, and correction.

FEW FAMOUS fathers have famous sons; but Mr. Gladstone, premier of England, is one of these favored few. He has a son in parliament, who is ranked as a "liberal conservative."

MR. W. J. POTTER read a very interesting essay before the Second Radical Club last Monday evening, the subject of which was "The Relation of Government to Individual Liberty."

WHY SHOULDN'T a Christian sect, even though a "liberal" one, expel those who do not speak its shibboleth? A "sect" is necessarily exclusive; nothing else ought to be expected of it.

THERE IS more or less bitterness of disappointment and sorrow in the life of every one; but he is the hero who, in spite of this, is able to keep his temper calm and sweet, and hold on to faith and courage.

HON. ALFRED CONKLING (father of Senator Roscoe Conkling), of New York, who has recently died, had been for some time a subscriber to THE INDEX, and held, as may be supposed, most liberal views in religion.

ONE OF Holman Hunt's pictures, "The Shadow of Death," was recently sold in London for $52,500. It represents Jesus, as a carpenter, stretching his arms after a day's hard toil, and thereby casting a shadow upon the wall in the shape of a figure hanging upon a cross.

THE VENERABLE Abby Kelley Foster, of Worcester, is threatened by law with the sale of her property on the 26th instant for non-payment of taxes. Mrs. Foster "takes her stand" on the principle of our Revolutionary Fathers—"no taxation without representation." If they were right, she is.

"THIS IS AN unintelligible world," says one. "I can't help crying a little and smiling a little over it all, and hoping for something brighter and better after a while." By all means, let those hope who can,—and who can help hoping somewhat, even in the worst of cases? It certainly does no harm to hope, but on the contrary a very good old book says, "we are saved by hope."

THE NEW ENGLAND LABOR REFORM LEAGUE will hold its next Annual Convention in Boston, February 22 and 23 (Sunday and Monday), at Codman Hall, 176 Tremont Street. There will be three sessions each day. Of course, the inevitable American concomitant of all public meetings—"speeches"—will be a prominent feature of this Convention. We hope it may be a good one.

CHARLES SUMNER relates a reminiscence of Daniel Webster. He and Mr. Webster were once counsel together in a case for the Commonwealth. They each received a fee of one thousand dollars. Mr. Webster collected both fees, but Mr. Sumner was never able to collect his fee of Mr. Webster! Doubtless the "great expounder" placed the money "where it would do the most good."

"THE GIPSIES reverence Christ," says Mr. Leland, because "he was born in the open field like a gipsy, and rode on an ass like one, and went round the world a-begging his bread like a Rom; and he was always a poor, wretched man like us, till he was destroyed by the Gentiles." Will suffering humanity ever cease to believe in a suffering God; or will the heart of man ever cease to yearn for an Infinite Heart to pity and love him?

FANNY FERN (Mrs. James Parton) once received the following laconic but expressive letter, which alone among many hundreds of a similar kind she preserved. It is such a letter as we should think the character of Mrs. Parton and of her writings would evoke from her admirers:—

"Cincinnati, June 24, 1854.

"Fanny Fern—I like you and your writings.

G. M. C."

MR. BEECHER has been telling his people what sort of dreams come to him in his night watches. In a recent sermon he said: "I have broken open more houses and stolen more money in my dreams than I ever expect to see awake; yet I believe I had rather die than steal. I have been a murderer in my dreams, and started up trembling out of a vain effort to hide the body." It strikes us that this is a candor wholly uncalled for, and in exceeding bad taste. We should say that such an exaggerated disposition to confess private experiences might be turned to much better account.

MR. CONWAY, in a letter from London to the Cincinnati Commercial, complains that the men whom President Grant has for the most part sent to represent America at European courts are "fourth-rate partisans." "Where is there," he says, "an official representative of America in Europe, to whom philosophical republicans like Gambetta, Louis Blanc, Castelar, Karl Blind, can point with pride and say there is a man to set beside your Bismarcks and DeBroglies?" Mr. Conway especially laments this, because, he says, "though it is a matter of profound indifference to Americans what may be thought of their country, it is not a matter of indifference to European republicans."

SOME OF THE women of Ohio are at present engaged in a warmly-contested campaign against liquor-selling in that State. They rely largely on prayer-meetings as a means of prosecuting their enterprise, in some cases regularly besieging a dram-shop with prayer and song and exhortation, until the owner closes his establishment in self-defence, when the triumphant meeting of praying sisters advances upon the next enemy. This is certainly one way of promoting temperance, and, questionable as it may appear in the eyes of some, we confess we prefer it to arbitrary prohibitive legislation. Any business which a man has not the courage to carry on under the eyes of praying women he probably had better drop.

ACCORDING TO THE Chicago Tribune, the sword of Byron—the identical weapon he used in the cause of Grecian independence—is at present the property of a citizen of this country. It was brought from Greece by Col. Miller, of Vermont, who was one of the volunteers to accompany Dr. Howe to Greece, and who distinguished himself in fighting for the freedom of the Greeks. He bought the sword from the family of a Greek officer to whom Byron had given it, and it is now owned and cherished by Col. Miller's descendants. The Tribune says this famous blade scarcely escaped being destroyed in the great Chicago fire, the lady who possesses it having fled from her burning home in that city, with only a small box of plate, a shawl thrown over her head, and the sacred relic of Byron in her hand.

Letter

TO

THE HON. FELIX R. BRUNOT,

PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

SIR:—

Your name is now conspicuous before the American people as President of "The National Association," organized to secure a religious Amendment to the Constitution of the United States by which these three theological dogmas would be inserted in the instrument, to be carried out and enforced by "appropriate legislation," namely:—

1. That Almighty God, whose character is depicted in the Bible, is the source of all authority and power in civil Government.

2. That Jesus Christ, by virtue of his absolute divinity, is Ruler over all the nations of the earth.

3. That the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, now in common use among Protestants, are the fountain of law, and the supreme rule for the conduct of nations.

Many of your fellow-citizens in the various churches, and many more out of them, look with alarm and apprehension at the movement which you head. They sincerely think that the society of which you are President aims to convert the Constitution into a religious creed, and to enforce it by pains and penalties. They are strengthened in this belief by the frequent and earnest memorials to Congress, by the general tenor of the editorials and contributed articles in the Christian Statesman, which is the organ of the Association, and by the uncontradicted statements and claims of its authorized agents and lecturers all over the country. It does not calm the fears of the people that these ultimate objects are not set down and avowed in the programme, but are generally denied. The Holy Inquisition, wherever it was established in Europe, made similar denials, and protested the benevolence of its schemes. In human affairs the adoption of a principle leads to inevitable results, whether intended or not.

The three doctrinal propositions which you desire to have incorporated into the Constitution appear vague in their meaning to the minds of most people; and, with the history of theological controversy before them, they believe that, if made a part of the organic law, they would inaugurate a war of interpretation, like that which has been raging in the Christian churches for a thousand years, about dogmas and ceremonials, beginning in words, continued by blows, and ending in the complete legal subjection of the weakest party in the strife. But the Rev. Mr. Kennedy of New York, an able and candid expounder of your plans, gives a very clear view of the far-reaching and comprehensive meaning of these three dogmas. He says, in a discourse printed in the Christian Statesman of the 15th of February last: "In pressing these amendments we ask the nation to accept a pretty extensive creed. When properly understood they would express our belief in the Trinity, in the covenant of grace, in the mediation and atonement and mediatorial offices of Christ, in the Holy Spirit as the author of Revelation, and in the inspiration, authority, and sufficiency of the word of God. Besides, in asking the nation to adopt them, we are asking it to renounce all heathenism, Judaism, popery, and infidelity. They are as distinctly Protestant as the National Covenant of Scotland."

I have italicized some words in this quotation to direct your attention to those large and respectable classes of the American people whose religious liberty of opinion and worship would be invaded, and discriminated against, by your proposed "amendments."

The fathers of this republic, seeing in the experience of Europe the terrible effect of a State religion in abridging human liberty and happiness, carefully secularized the Government they founded; and built in the Constitution a wall high as heaven to prevent any church, or any form of religion whatever, from meddling and dictating in political affairs. They believed that religion was a private and individual concern between each man and his Maker; and that the only business of Government in relation thereto was to protect every human being in the private enjoyment, and public expression, of his opinions, and in his worship. This is peculiarly and emphatically the American idea. The self-support and independence of the churches, the secular character of the schools, and all other institutions supported by public funds, are mere inferences from this grand doctrine. The wisdom of our fathers displayed in this policy is more apparent now than it was in 1787. By a kind of inspiration they seem to have foreseen what we now behold, that there is no nation on earth so heterogeneous in the matter of religious opinion, and in the blood and nationalities of those who now form our great political family. The Government being a mere instrument to protect all the inhabitants in the enjoyment of their personal and property rights, is as secular in its character as a railroad corporation; and no citizen should ever have his religious feelings hurt by any Governmental act or custom that would obtrude religious forms or dogmas upon his observance, or require his money to keep them up.

The Scotch idea of civil Government, which is the one your Association accepts, and contends for, is the very reverse of the American. It is entirely Old World in its origin, and was hatched in the corruption of political despotisms and church establishments, which always go hand in hand. It is, that a corporation called a nation, or a Government, however diverse in religious sentiment it may be, in order to secure the favor of Heaven, can be, and ought to be, Christian. From the Church of Rome the Scotch got the strange conception that a State—a Government—is "a moral person," and should have a confession of faith incorporated into the organic law, and pledge itself to sustain soundness in the faith, and to suppress as heresy and immorality whatever the Church decreed to be such.

But if it were possible for an absurdity to be true I would respectfully ask a question in regard to the philosophy of personifying a nationality similar to the one which Castelar, in the Spanish Cortes, put to Bishop Manterola, when that Roman Catholic divine argued for the very same doctrine. If the State be a moral person, capable of believing a creed and worshipping God on the one hand, and of being heretical and irreligious on the other, whereabouts, in the valley of Jehoshaphat, will the State called Spain be found in the day of judgment? But the Scottish chiefs were permeated with this Catholic idea that the State was a moral person, accountable for its religious belief, and bound to accept it as inculcated by the Church.

Hence they succeeded during the reign of Charles I., in 1580, in getting a "National Covenant" established in which the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with the king at their head, bound themselves by solemn oath to extirpate popery, prelacy, and heresy of all kinds, and to "maintain the true religion of Jesus Christ, the preaching of his Holy Word, the due and right ministration of the sacraments now received and preached within this realm, according to the confession of faith immediately preceding, and shall abolish and gainstand all false religion contrary to the same; and that they shall be careful to root out of their empire all heretics, and enemies to the true worship of God, who shall be convicted by the true kirk of God of the foresaid crimes."

In the year 1643, this "National Covenant" failing to accomplish its purpose, and as if it were not rigid enough, the Scotch drew up the famous "Solemn League and Covenant," which, being urged by the Church, was signed by "noblemen, barons, knights, gentlemen, citizens, burgesses, ministers of the Gospel, and commons of all sorts" in the three kingdoms, headed, as before, by the monarch himself. The avowed and sole object of this league was "the extirpation of popery, prelacy (the government of the Church of bishops), superstition, heresy, schism, profaneness, and whatsoever shall be found (by the Church) to be contrary to sound doctrine, and the power of godliness." This covenant was ratified in 1643 by the two Houses of the English Parliament, and in 1644 by the Scotch Parliament. Thus the Scotch Church had everything their own way. The three kingdoms were all "Christian" and Orthodox, and all classes of people from the king to the cottager stood in close covenant relations to God. The clergy were supreme. The Church sessions was omnipotent. The streets and private houses of the towns and cities were searched every day by bailies, and ruling elders, to see if any one absented himself from the sermons, either on Sundays or week days; and a surveillance was established all over the nation, only equalled by the Spanish Inquisition. These were the glorious days of the Church. God was supposed to be placated by the Christian zeal and orthodoxy of both the rulers and the ruled; and the lapse of time, it was believed, would only reveal the peace and prosperity in store for those who had thus sanctified their Government, and put God into the Constitution of England, and made all classes the submissive servants of the Church.

The leading men in the Association of which you are the President are Scotch Presbyterian Covenanters, who honestly believe that this Solemn League and Covenant of 1644, which their ancestors signed in Scotland, is still binding on their posterity. And it is on this account, and because the Government of the United States totally ignores it, that they all decline to discharge the duties of citizenship in this country, by refusing to vote, hold office, sit on juries, or do anything that requires them to take the oath of allegiance to what they denounce as a Christless and Godless Constitution. They regard themselves among all the sects as the only organized contenders "for Christ's Crown and Covenant." And although they are willing to use you, and the rest of their dupes in the other denominations, to accomplish their political plans, they would debar you all from their communion tables as unfit, in your present church connections, to take the sacramental oath to Christ and his cause. I do no injustice to these men in saying that they would rejoice with joy unspeakable, and die in peace, if that same Solemn League and Covenant were, mutatis mutandis, adopted by the American Congress, and the Government and people placed under it as an instrument for carrying out its theory, as was the case in the British Isles, in the good old days of the Stuart kings.

But I now submit this proposition to your judgment: that if the religious amendment you ask, with the other dogmas and policy which the Rev. Mr. Kennedy says are included and meant by it, were adopted; and if, in addition thereto, the whole Westminster Confession of Faith and Catechisms were put into the Constitution; nay, if the Solemn League and Covenant itself were substantially adopted, and the President, heads of departments, and the two Houses of Congress, were to join the Covenanter Church,—it would not secure the object you profess to have in view, in making the nation really Christian. As this statement is a reflection on your wisdom, and charges with the most expensive folly your co-workers of the National Association, allow me to prove its truth by an appeal to history.

I have already said, what I now repeat, that no nation ever had so fair an opportunity of testing the truth and practicability of the Scotch theory of civil Government as Scotland had in 1644. There was almost entire unanimity of sentiment on the subject of religion among the people, they being all Presbyterians. There was also entire homogeneousness of blood, there being no race distinctions. Then there was more real earnestness in the work of making the Government and nation Christian than was ever witnessed before or since; for such was the prevailing zeal that many opened a vein in their arms, and with their hearts' blood subscribed the Covenant. The machinery of Church and State was not only constructed, as they alleged, after the pattern shown to them in the Mount, but was put in motion under the most favorable auspices, the Solemn League and Covenant having been adopted by the highest civil, as well as religious, authority in the three kingdoms. If there was anything in national covenant relations to God calculated in any wise to make a people steadfast and consistent in their morals, and warm in their piety, it might be looked for in Scotland in the middle of the seventeeth century, when religion was the chief business of the Church and State, and of the people in their private capacity, and when in some centres of influence they had as many as twenty and thirty sermons in a week.

Yet, in 1648—only four years after this Solemn League and Covenant had been sworn to under the most impressive circumstances, by all classes of the people, from the king on the throne down to the humblest subject,—so general and fearful had been the declension in religion and morals that "A Solemn Acknowledgment of Public Sins and Breaches of the Covenant, and a Solemn Engagement to all the Duties contained therein," was proclaimed by the General Assembly of the Church, and by the Parliament of Scotland.

This remarkable document, like the Solemn League and Covenant, was signed by "noblemen, barons, gentlemen, burgesses, ministers of the Gospel, and commons of all sorts." In it they make an honest and tearful confession to which I ask your particular attention. "We do humbly and sincerely, as in his sight who is the Searcher of hearts, acknowledge the many sins, and great transgressions, of the land: we have done wickedly;—our kings, our princes, our nobles, our judges, our officers, our teachers, and our people. We have not remembered to render unto the Lord according to his goodness, and according to our vows and promises; but have gone away backward by a continual course of backsliding, and have broken all the articles of that Solemn League and Covenant, which we swore before God, angels, and men. We have been so far from endeavoring the extirpation of profaneness, and what is contrary to the power of godliness, that profanity hath been much winked at, and profane persons much countenanced, and many times employed, until iniquity and ungodliness hath gone over the face of the land as a flood. We have refused to be reformed, and have walked proudly and obstinately against the Lord, not valuing his Gospel, nor submitting ourselves unto the obedience thereof. Ignorance of God, and of his Son Jesus Christ, prevails exceedingly in the land; the greatest part of masters of families amongst noblemen, barons, gentlemen, burgesses, and commons, neglect to seek God in their families. Nay, many of the nobility, gentry, and boroughs, who should have been examples of godliness and sober walking unto others, have been ringleaders of excess and rioting. It were impossible to reckon up all the abominations that are in the land; but the blaspheming of the name of God, swearing by the creatures, profanation of the Lord's day, uncleanness, drunkenness, excess and rioting, vanity of apparel, lying and deceit, railing and cursing, arbitrary and uncontrolled oppression, and grinding of the faces of the poor by landlords, and others in place and power, are become ordinary and common sins. Because religion is of all things the most excellent and precious, the advancing and promoting the power thereof against all ungodliness and profanity; the securing and preserving the purity thereof against all error, heresy, and schism, and, namely, Independency, Anabaptism, Arminianism, and Socinianism, and the carrying on of the work of uniformity shall be studied and endeavored before all worldly interests."

Now, I beg you to remember that this bill of indictment, so terrible and so sweeping in its details and bearings on the character of the Scotch people, is not drawn up by their enemies. It is their own confession, and they made it as sincerely as they swore to the Solemn League and Covenant. And it proves most conclusively that their theory of government was false, impracticable, and mischievous—so mischievous that the Prince of Orange on his accession to the throne, Calvinist as he was, ignored it entirely, as did the Church of Scotland itself, ultimately, except a handful so small that they had no preacher or Presbytery for years, whose descendants in this country are striving, with you at their head, to reënact the same foolish proceedings on American soil! The characters of men formed under such influences were proved to be hollow, deceitful, and unreliable. For although the Solemn League and Covenant was gotten up mainly to extirpate heresy, and especially that form of it called prelacy; and although the two Stuart kings had subscribed the Covenant, they both did their best while they lived to force upon Scotland that very prelacy they had repeatedly sworn against!

But this is not all. In 1650, Cromwell, with an army of the same men in England who had subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant, invaded Scotland, scattered the General Assembly from their place of meeting, and drove its members—their fellow "Christians" and Covenanters — through the streets of Edinburgh like criminals, and converted their churches into horse-stables!

Thus, I think, I have given you proof from the records of history that the Scotch idea of civil government, which, after a fair trial, was repudiated in England, and Scotland, too, on the accession of William and Mary; which was utterly condemned by the founders of this republic in 1787; which is being now repudiated in Germany, Spain, and Mexico; but which you and your allies are striving to incorporate into the Constitution of the United States,—is one pregnant with nothing but evil. From the confession of the Scotch themselves, so far from having any good influence in making the nation Christian, it had the very opposite effect. The only way you can dull the edge of the argument I make against your enterprise is by saying, what I would not dare to say, that these confessions of the Covenanters were made in a Pickwickian sense, like so many of the pulpit confessions of our day, where the preacher and people acknowledge to God that they are miserable sinners, and that if they had their just deserts they would long ago have been doomed to the flames of hell forever; while, if others brought such scandalous charges against them, it would greatly disturb their self-complacency.

In their National Covenants the Scotch Presbyterians combined together, not only to maintain their own doctrine and discipline, but to extirpate—root out—Popery, Prelacy, Independency, Arminianism, and Socinianism. Now, to say nothing of the Catholics, all the Congregational churches in New England and the West practice Independency, and are more or less Arminian and Socinian in their theology. All the Baptist churches of the United States, without exception, are also Independents. The entire Methodist Church is Arminian. And the Protestant Episcopal Church, as its corporate name implies, is Prelatical. Yet the world witnesses the anomalous spectacle of Methodist Bishops, and Episcopal Bishops, Arminians, Socinians, and Universalists, coöperating with the Covenanters in a plan to revolutionize the Government, and bring about a state of things which would most certainly send them all to prison as heretics, or, at the least, place them under political disability! If these right reverend gentlemen, these Arminians, Socinians, and Independents, do not know the history and extent of the plot, and that they would be the first victims to the Scotch theory of government, what are we to think of the amount of their knowledge on the subject? If they do know what the plan is, and yet coöperate with the ring-leaders, what are we to think of their characters as honest and patriotic men?

The Covenanters who are managing this matter tell you that they regard the Scotch Covenants as still binding. Prelacy, Independency, Arminianism, and Socinianism, are to them now just as deadly and damnable heresies as they ever were to their fathers. They have not altered one word of the twenty-third chapter of the Westminster Confession of Faith in regard to the power of the Civil Magistrate, but still proclaim to the world as firmly as ever that he "hath authority, and it is his duty to take order, that unity and peace be preserved in the Church, that the truth of God be kept pure and entire, that all blasphemies and heresies be suppressed, all corruptions and abuses in worship and discipline be prevented or reformed, and all the ordinances of God be duly settled, administered, and observed. For the better effecting whereof, he hath power to call Synods, to be present at them, and to provide that whatsoever is transacted in them be according to the mind of God."

These men would not for the world commune with you either in your churches or theirs, but solemnly debar you, and all other Protestants, from the Lord's table on every sacramental occasion because they regard them all as guilty of damnable heresy. Yet you, sir, a Prelatist, preëminently exposed to their ecclesiastical denunciation, with the fate of Archbishop Sharpe still in your memory, are engaged, with other "heretics," either ignorantly or wilfully, in playing into the hands of these men, and paving the way to your own destruction! And if you are delivered, as I trust you will be, from such a fate, it will be mainly owing to the influence of that large class of men who are outside of all churches, and whom your creed regards, on that account, as in danger of losing their souls in the other world!

But in support of the proposition I submitted to your judgment, we have before us at this moment, in our own country, proof, not so wholesale as in the case of the Scotch, and not by the confession of the guilty persons themselves, but nevertheless very strong and convincing, that there is nothing in the profession of a creed, and observance of religious ceremonies, and the display of religious zeal and devotion (which, according to the Orthodox standard, constitute a Christian), that has any sure influence in making a man a reliable public officer. I refer to the Crédit Mobilier developments last winter, and the bribery, corruption, and defalcations of persons who stand in high positions of trust in the political and business centres of the country. Never since the foundation of the Government has there been such an exposure of meanness, lying, and dishonor of all kinds among our public men as that I refer to. Never were the faces of good men and patriots so reddened with shame; never were the hearts of the friends of free government in Europe so filled with apprehension concerning the future as they now are. Yet, in these damnable and damning proceedings on the public stage, with Washington as its centre, you will find more than a dozen of the most conspicuous actors who are all sound professing Christians on the Scotch model. Some of them are pets of the Young Men's Christian Association. One of them, even after his bright disc had been eclipsed by the transit of Ames, and his best friends were in agony over its effects, was invited to address the Christian Association at Philadelphia, and did so, amidst the most tumultuous applause. Mr. Pomeroy still retains his position as President of the Young Men's Christian Association at Washington; for this Association, like the one at Philadelphia, is no how scrupulous as to the decency and morality of a public man, provided he "stands well up for Jesus," and is a sound professing "Christian." They blot out the eternal distinction which God has ordained, and practically declare that there is no difference between truthfulness and falsehood, honesty and fraud, honor and dishonor, if a man only be a "Christian."

This is the genuine Scotch idea. We all know the grossly immoral life of Charles II., and how black and leprous his soul was with perjury and vice. Yet the Covenanters stuck to him through it all, and seemed satisfied as long as they could keep him swearing to the Solemn League and Covenant. This made the king a "Christian," and his Government the ordinance of God.

But this is not the American idea. The noble men who founded this Government, and set its machinery a-going under the present Constitution, were not "Christians." Nevertheless, they were wise, and just, and honorable, and true, and manly; and practised such virtues because they were right in themselves, and were their own reward. They would have scorned the peculations, the treachery, and the low vice of lying, which have distinguished so many of the "Christian statesmen" of our day; and would have said, "If that is religion, then let us be irreligious, or at least *un*religious."

It has been well said by a leading New York paper that the Young Men's Christian Association, in shouting their applause for men in the position of Mr. Colfax and Mr. Pomeroy, thus endorsing their religious character, are fast driving the people of this country to regard membership in such Associations, not only as no proof of integrity, but as prima facie evidence of a want of integrity; just as the deliberate and long-continued plunderings in the Methodist Book Concern, by zealous professing "Christians," and the long concealment of the facts when they were well known to its officers, shook the confidence of the public in the whole fabric of the Church.

Now the point I respectfully submit to you, and to the organ of your Association, the Christian Statesman, is, that if these Crédit Mobilier Christians who lie, and bribe, and steal from the Government, would wreck their reputations for the petty sums they received, could we expect anything better from them under the amended Constitution? In other words, if the fear of an angry and jealous God; the fear of the devil, who goeth about the halls of Congress, State Legislatures, merchants' counting-houses, and morocco factories, as a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour; and the fear of a lake of fire and brimstone, where liars, thieves, and those who give and take bribes, are punished with eternal burnings,—cannot restrain men in high official position from the meanest and commonest crimes, when the adoption of their creed is a voluntary thing, could we expect more of them if a profession of that creed were required by a constitutional test?

It is said by English writers that when subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, and taking the sacrament (which were the sequels of the Solemn League and Covenant), were required by law as a test for political office, and for admission into the universities, the effect was, as might have been expected, to spread falsehood and hypocrisy all through the higher classes of society. For belief is not a voluntary thing; and to require men to believe a creed which their reason rejects, and take the sacrament as proof of their sincerity, or else to be excluded from political office, and the opportunities of a university education, is to convert them into cowardly knaves.

The National Association, of which you are President, has long been crying to heaven for "Christian" men to be sent to Congress, and to occupy the high places of trust in the land; and for wicked, that is, unconverted men, to be consigned to their proper places of powerless obscurity. One of your zealous brethren, with a faith strong enough to remove mountains, if he would only undertake it, recently boasted that the Amendment project would succeed, and that the "saints would soon possess the kingdom," and take things into their own hands. Well, we had a lot of these professional saints at Washington last winter. How did you like their looks and ways—Saint Colfax, Saint Patterson, Saint Pomeroy? The worldlings and infidels in Congress, as a class, do not seem to have itching palms. Their hearts and consciences do not seem to be eaten up of covetousness and greed. They seem to have more faith in Providence than to provide for the future by stealing in the present. Yet if any people in the world, according to your theology, would lie, and rob the Government, and do all manner of wickedness, these infidels and worldlings are the very men you might expect to do such things. For they are either ignorant of, or indifferent to, your theology, or hostile to it. They have no fear of God, and no fear of the devil, before their eyes; and smile incredulously at the pulpit fulminations concerning the wrath to come. How is it, then, that this very class of men behave themselves well, when the "Christians" who profess to believe so many Orthodox dogmas, and are so punctilious and devout in their religious ceremonies, act like atheists? Are they atheists? Is their high profession a sham, a cloak, to deceive that large class of simple and credulous people composing the religious public, who believe that all is gold which glitters? Do not these "Christians" of the Crédit Mobilier type, in their practical unbelief, virtually say with Macbeth, that if the acceptance of the stock with its amazing dividends could trammel up the consequence, here, upon this bank and shoal of time, they would jump the life to come? Are the infidels and worldlings in Congress who are not mixed up in this scandal, and who look with supreme pity and contempt on those who are, under the power of a higher, purer, and stronger motive than that which technical, or church, Christianity gives for the guidance of men? Oakes Ames and James Brooks, men not professing to be under the power of godliness, sank into their graves beneath the withering scorn of the American people, whose trust they had betrayed; for they had no Young Men's Christian Association to sustain them, and no church endorsement of their characters. But the Crédit Mobilier saints do not seem to be troubled with any squeamish sense of honor, but thrive, grow fat and defiant, under the basking smiles of the religious public. Verily they belong to the order of pachydermata, and are a study both for the statesman and the moralist.

Since, then, it appears from Scotch and American history that to be a "Christian" is no proof at all of a man's integrity of character and fitness for places of honor or trust in the Government, how can you and your associates persist in demanding that this nation shall commit the same folly and crime that Scotland and England did, in trying to make a soulless corporation like Government "a moral person," capable of believing a creed, taking the sacrament, and thus becoming Christian? When the utter emptiness of a religious profession, and its inability to make men honest and honorable, is demonstrated by the revelations of the Crédit Mobilier, how can you still insist that the saints shall possess the kingdom? Can you wonder that men's hearts are filled with indignation, and their eyes flash fire, when, with the unbounded liberty which every one has in this country to hold and teach whatever religion he pleases, you should be engaged in the project of forcing upon the majority a creed which you know is believed by only a mere handful of the people? I have no idea that, if the people understood your enterprise, it could ever succeed in a single county of a single State. The only danger is that, by false issues and complications, you may take snap judgment on the people. The clerical members of your Association have practically adopted the motto of the Jesuits, that the end sanctifies the means, and by concealing, explaining away, taking liberties with men's names (as Gov. Jewell and Gov. Washburn say they did with theirs in placing them on the list of Vice-Presidents without their consent), playing upon the superstitions of the ignorant, and practising pious frauds, have aroused the fears of many good men that under the idea of honoring God this mischievous scheme may be carried out, and the chains be riveted on the people before they are awakened by a free discussion of the subject.

It is painful for me to allude to the Crédit Mobilier exposure, and the defection of so many distinguished "Christians" in matters of common honesty and patriotism. For I am an American; and they are my countrymen and my fellow-men. But my object is to set the people to thinking, and to convince them that what we want in Congress, and other places of public responsibility, is, not "Christians," but men of high personal honor and deep conscientiousness, whether they be Christians or not, who will scorn to lie and steal because they esteem such things to be mean and wrong. We have had men of such characters in our past history, and the breed is not run out. If, instead of training our young men in the snivelling babyishness and unscrupulous goodishness of the Young Men's Christian Association of Philadelphia, and of the churches whose code of taste and morals is as low; if, instead of teaching them that deliberate scoundrelism of character can be atoned for by an application of the blood of Jesus on the recurrence of every sacramental occasion,—we would make them manly, truthful, conscientious, and honorable, in all the relations of life, and thus fit them for the public service, we would meet the difficulty which you propose to remedy by a religious amendment of the Constitution.

CIVIS.

VITAL PIETY.—A few years ago, a hungry company sat down at the well-spread supper-table of a Sound steamer, upon which one of the dishes contained a single trout of moderate size. A serious-looking individual at once drew this dish towards him, saying apologetically, "This is a fast day with me." His next neighbor, an Irish gentleman, immediately inserted his fork in the fish and transferred it to his own plate, remarking, "Jasus! sir, do you suppose nobody has a sowl to be saved but yourself?"

THE REV. J. D. FULTON'S acknowledgment of the receipt of a cake of soap from a Boston dealer would be ridiculous, if it did not savor of the sacrilegious. "I have used your soap," he says, "with profit and pleasure; but, best of all, I have held pleasant converse with you concerning Him who washes all our sins away."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

THE IRRELIGIOUS AMENDMENT.

In another column will be found the text of a new Religious Amendment proposed to the National Constitution. It is suggested and advocated by THE INDEX, and is a fresh proof of its editor's logical and candid mind. It stands in the form of a substitute for the present first Amendment to the Constitution, and proposes that that Amendment shall consist of three sections instead of one. The first is to read as now, with the addition of the words in italics: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," &c. The second is to provide that "no State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, &c.... No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion." The third section empowers Congress to enforce the provisions of the second section by appropriate legislation.

The motive for this proposition lies in the fact that although a national Religious Establishment is prohibited by the Constitution, Congress is not forbidden to pass laws which recognize the authority and serve the cause of the Christian religion in other ways. The laws providing for chaplains in the army and navy, laws providing for the use of the oath, and laws enforcing Christian morality in the Territories, are of this character. They "favor" the Christian religion. So, too, the States are not even forbidden to set up an establishment of religion, and all the States possess a great body of laws which are derived directly from the Christian religion, and whose existence and operation "favor" that religion. Of this character are the constitutional provisions, in many States, which require a belief in God as a qualification for civil office; laws requiring or authorizing the use of the Bible in the public schools; laws guarding from blasphemy the names of God, of Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Ghost; laws enforcing the cessation of labor and business on the Sabbath; laws providing for Christian religious instruction in prisons, asylums, and reformatory institutions under the care of the Government; laws requiring the use of the oath in the qualification of witnesses and officers; and laws enforcing the restrictions which the Christian religion throws around marriage and divorce. The proposed amendment aims to overthrow all these Christian features in the legislation of the States, or, in the words of its author, to "make liberty the law of the whole country, all the inconsistencies of the separate States to the contrary notwithstanding." The "Demands of Liberalism," which stand beside it in the columns of THE INDEX, are a frank and instructive commentary on its purpose and the effect it would have if adopted.

This is called by its advocates the "Religious Freedom Amendment" to the Constitution. Denying, as we do, that any wrong is done to disbelievers in the Christian religion by the existing connection of our Government with Christianity, we cannot admit the propriety of this designation. A measure whose avowed design is to divorce our Government from all connection with religion, we can only designate as the Irreligious Amendment. So long as the nation continues predominantly Christian in its population, the success of this measure would seem to us the triumph of intolerance. The minority would prevail to prohibit the nation from acknowledging and serving its God. It is needless to say, and in this the editor of THE INDEX heartily agrees with us, that success under these circumstances can only be won through the inconsistency and unfaithfulness of Christians.

We have no fears, however, that it can ever prevail. It will command zealous and able and numerous advocates. It coincides with the drift which has so long been bearing us away from the moorings of our earlier history. It will even strengthen and deepen, in some quarters, the current which sets toward national irreligion. But it is opposed to the reaction which has set in in the contrary direction. Already the tide is rising under us which will yet reverse the current. Even now the wind of heaven, the breath of the Eternal Spirit, fills the sails which have hung idly by the mast. The eyes of the wise have opened to our dangers, willing hands are at work in zealous, well-directed labors, generous hearts are pouring out their gifts, and earnest souls are pleading at the Throne of Grace for the speedy return of this nation to the spirit and purpose of its founders, and for the perfect realization here of the Kingdom of Jesus Christ. These labors and supplications shall not be in vain. Even the passage of the Irreligious Amendment would be but an incident of the conflict and a presage of final victory. Adopted or not, it will serve to make plain the issue and clear the field of non-combatants. It affords a clear, incisive statement of our question: Shall the Constitution be amended to conform to the Constitutions and laws of the States, or shall it be amended to overthrow them? It recognizes the organic law of the nation as a proper field for the struggle of the two conflicting ideas. The silence of the Constitution has at length emboldened the enemies of Christianity to demand that it speak out in their favor. Had the Constitution always been Christian, this Amendment would not now have been proposed. The proposal is a fresh warning that this silence should cease. "There is a time to speak." We thank THE INDEX for this as for many previous services to the cause of truth.—Christian Statesman.

CALL FOR A NATIONAL CONVENTION.

The people of the United States are awakening to the fact that the national Constitution is destitute of any explicit acknowledgment of God or the Christian religion. Although it is the fundamental law of a great Christian people, its want of a distinct Christian character has led even such men as Dr. Woolsey, ex-President of Yale College, to state that it would need no change to adapt it to a Mohammedan nation.

Thus many of the friends as well as the foes of Christianity are pointing out a strange inconsistency. While it is an indisputable fact that our Government is, and always has been, administered in connection with the Christian religion; that many of its laws, customs, and institutions are distinctively Christian, it is yet maintained on the one side, and admitted on the other, that the Constitution, with which all our laws and institutions should accord, is no more Christian than Mohammedan.

This inconsistency, long a matter of deep regret to many of our best citizens, is now a cause of alarm. It is being used, persistently and in many instances successfully, against the Christian institutions of our nation. It is made the basis of the most dangerous assaults on the use of the Bible in the common schools, Sabbath laws, public fasts and thanksgivings, prayers in Congress and State Legislatures, and all other similar features of our national life.

And now the momentous issue is before us as American citizens: How shall we harmonize the inconsistency? Shall we prove faithless to the inheritance bequeathed to us by Christian fathers, and permit our best institutions to be overthrown on the ground that they are opposed to the Constitution? Are these times of political corruption, financial disaster, pestilence, and want, times for us, as a nation, to depart farther from God? Shall we not rather, faithful to our trust as Christian citizens, and realizing our dependence on Divine strength and wisdom, harmonize whatever may be inconsistent in the Constitution and Government by a reverent acknowledgment, in both, of Almighty God and His Revealed Will?

A National Association has been formed to secure such an Amendment to the Constitution as will suitably acknowledge Almighty God as the Author of the nation's existence and the ultimate source of its authority, Jesus Christ as its Ruler, and the Bible as the supreme rule of its conduct, and thus indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all Christian laws, institutions, and usages on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land. This Association invites all citizens who favor such an Amendment, without distinction of party or creed, to meet in LIBRARY HALL, Pittsburg, on Wednesday, February 4, 1874, at two o'clock, P. M.

All such citizens, to whose notice this Call may be brought, are requested to hold meetings, and appoint delegates to the Convention.

"WIFE, WIFE, what has become of the grapes?" "I suppose, my dear, the hens picked them off," was the bland reply. "Hens—hens! Some two-legged hens, I guess," said the husband, with some impetuosity; to which she calmly replied, "My dear, did you ever see any other kind?"

ROME VS. THE BIBLE.

In discountenancing the general reading of the Bible in schools and elsewhere, Roman Catholics have ample precedent in the history of their Church. A correspondent of the Manchester Examiner and Times cites the following incidents:—

Fact 1. Pope Gregory VII. wrote a letter to Wratislaw (1080) condemning the general freedom allowed to read the Bible in the vulgar tongue.

Fact 2. Pope Innocent III. declared (1199) the Scriptures too profound for the common people, and quoted the Sinaitic restriction: "If so be that a beast touch the mountain it shall be stoned or thrust through with a dart."

Fact 3. The Council of Toulouse (1229) declared (Article 14) that the laity must not possess the Books of the Old and New Testament; only the Psalter and the Breviary, and these not in the vulgar tongue.

Fact 4. The Council of Tarracona (1233) declared (Article 2) that "no one, either priest or layman, is to possess a Roman translation of the Bible; all such translations to be given up to the Bishops within eight days, and to be straightway burnt. Whoso does not, be he priest or layman, is to be esteemed a heretic."

Fact 5. The Synod of Oxford (1408) declared (Article 7) that "the Bible is not to appear in English, and the Wicliffe version not to be used."

Fact 6. Ximenes, Archbishop of Toledo (circ. 1500), declares: "It is utterly wrong to circulate the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue. The mind of the common people is such that if a thing is simple and plain they despise it; what is hidden they venerate. Christ himself spoke in parables that the people might not understand. The Old and New Testaments should be retained in the three languages in which the superscription on the cross was written."

Fact 7. When Protestants were burnt in Queen Mary's reign, Bibles were thrown into the flames on the ground that "they were the books that made the heretics."

Fact 8. The Council of Trent (1563) withholds the forgiveness of sins from any man who shall dare even to have a Bible in the vulgar tongue without license from his ecclesiastical superiors.

Fact 9. Cardinal Hosius (1570) said: "To give the Bible to the laity is to cast pearls before swine. Bible translations have done harm; I would not have any. The Bible is the possession of the Roman Church; beyond it it is worth no more than Æsop's fables."

Fact 10. The Jerusalem Synod (1672), attended by sixty-seven bishops and clergy, decided that the Bible is not to be read by all Christians.

Fact 11. The famous Bull of Pope Clement XI. (1799), Unigenitus, pronounces it to be a false, scandalous, pernicious, blasphemous error to hold that all may read Holy Scriptures. Article 80, 83.

Fact 12. That the French Bible, translated by Pastor Quesnel (a Romish priest), was burnt by the authority of his Church, in 1699.

Fact 13. Pope Benedict XIV. (1740) did his best to hinder the translation of the Bible into Persian.

Fact 14. Pope Leo XII. issued an Encyclical against Bible societies in 1824.

Fact 15. The Roman Catholic priesthood did their utmost to put a stop to the circulation of the Scriptures in Ireland in 1820 and following years.

Fact 16. Pope Pius VII. issued a bull forbidding the circulation of the Scriptures.

Fact 17. Pope Gregory XVI. issued an Encyclical against Bible societies, 1832 and 1844.

Fact 18. Pope Pius IX. (the present Pope, in his Encyclical of November, 1846, anathematized "those very crafty and most deceitful (vaferrimae) societies, called Bible societies, which thrust the Bible into the hands of inexperienced youth."—Evening Post.

THE BAPTIST CLERGY ON THE TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

At the regular weekly meeting of the Baptist clergymen, at the Tremont Temple this forenoon, the question of the taxation of church property was discussed. Rev. Dr. Dickerson, who opened the discussion, contended that the property of ecclesiastical organizations should not be taxed, on the ground that such a measure would be both unjust and impolitic.

Rev. Mr. Abbott, of Allston, said that his interest in the question exceeded the bounds of calmness, and approached that of excitement. Government did not exist for the purpose of levying and collecting taxes, but to the end that good morals and good order in society may be promoted. As taxation was a burden, it should be made to bear first and most upon those things least essential to the welfare and happiness of the people, and lastly on those things which are indispensable. Charitable and religious institutions being in the latter category should be brought down to zero in the scale of taxation. The money for their support was paid out of the pockets of the best members of society, to maintain good order. There were doubtless church organizations which were little better than clubs, and which should be made an exception and taxed.

Rev. Mr. Miner (not Dr. Miner) asked what they would do with stock-company churches, where men who never went there put their money as a safe and good investment. A man had told him that he bought two shares in Park Street Church because it paid well, although he didn't go there himself. If you get a popular preacher in a club room, why shouldn't it be taxed?

Prof. Gould, of the Newton Theological Seminary, agreed with the positions taken by the first speaker. The ground taken by the Government was a safe one, and taxation simply assumes that as the Government protects men in their rights they must pay their pro rata proportion. The Church exists under the protection of the State in property rights, and the question was, Shall the Church bear its proportion of the expense of this protection. He argued that the State and Church were under mutual obligations to each other. The Church so far promotes the same objects as the State that the latter may justly remit the tax, the obligations being mutual.

The fundamental ground upon which to base opposition to this measure was that the Church confers a benefit upon the State, which is a fair return for any protection extended to it. If any exception was to be made, it should be to impose a tax upon Roman Catholic churches, inasmuch as the principles which they maintain are subversive of the principles of a Government like our own. As Bismarck had said, "they are a body within the State seeking to overthrow the State." This was not persecution, but political safety. That Church existed for political purposes, and the State had a right to say, "You shall not be exempted from taxation upon your property."

This closed the discussion, and Rev. Mr. Seymore announced that the same question would be discussed at the next meeting.

Rev. Dr. Eddy, who presided, announced that a movement had been started for a pastoral union of all the Evangelical churches, meetings of which it was proposed to hold every six weeks, for prayer and conference, and to consider the Christian work in the city. The proposition came from the Congregational body, and grew out of the reading of an essay on the subject. He suggested the appointment of a committee to coöperate with other denominations; and Rev. Dr. Eddy, Rev. Mr. Gordon, Rev. Mr. Gardner, and Prof. Lincoln were appointed.

The subject of securing a modification of the law relating to the holding of church property was broached, and will be considered at the next meeting. —Boston Journal, Feb. 2.

CHURCH PROPERTY TAXATION.

THE SUBJECT DISCUSSED BY THE BAPTIST CLERGY AT THEIR MEETING YESTERDAY.

The question of taxation of church property was made the subject of discussion at the regular weekly meeting of the Baptist ministers, held at Tremont Temple, yesterday forenoon. The discussion was opened by the Rev. Dr. Dickerson, of South Boston, who took ground against taxation. The Rev. Mr. Abbott, of Alston, followed him, taking the same side of the argument. He claimed that taxes should not be levied on religious and charitable institutions, because they are essential to the welfare of man, and the money for their support is paid by the best citizens for the public good. There were institutions, he said, which, while claiming to be churches, were little more than clubs, and these, he thought, should be taxed. The Rev. Mr. Miner and Professor Gould of the Newton Theological Seminary spoke against the proposition to tax church property, but the latter made an exception, in language nearly as follows: "The fundamental ground upon which to base opposition to this measure was that the Church confers a benefit upon the State, which is a fair return for any protection extended to it. If any exception was to be made, it should be to impose a tax upon Roman Catholic churches, inasmuch as the principles which they maintain are subversive of the principles of a Government like our own. As Bismarck had said, 'they are a body within the State, seeking to overthrow the State.' This was not persecution, but political safety. That Church existed for political purposes, and the State had a right to say, 'You shall not be exempted from taxation upon your property.'" This closed the discussion, but the subject will be taken up again next Monday. The Rev. Dr. Eddy, who presided, announced that a movement had been started for a pastoral union of all the Evangelical churches, meetings of which it was proposed to hold every six weeks for prayer and conference and to consider the Christian work in the city. The proposition came from the Congregational body, and grew out of the reading of an essay on the subject. He suggested the appointment of a committee to coöperate with other denominations; and the Rev. Dr. Eddy, the Rev. Mr. Gordon, the Rev. Mr. Gardner, and Professor Lincoln, were appointed.—Boston Globe, Feb. 3.

DOES ERROR DIE?

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again;
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies amid his worshippers."

Sometimes words of smoothest diction
And seeming truth conceal a fiction,
And even Bryant may, at times,
Say things untruthful in his rhymes.
Of facts a host are seen to rise
To show that error never dies,—
That truth, when crushed to earth by wrong,
In base subjection suffers long.

Coëval with the birth of time,
Existing still in every clime,
Exerting his malignant sway
O'er those who willingly obey,
Grim Error, as of yore, is seen,
Though changing oft his garb and mien,
Like Proteus of pagan fame,
Appearing seldom twice the same.

Ubiquitous as light or air,
We find him present everywhere;
He mingles freely in the brawls
That rise in legislative halls;
Sometimes he wears judicial mien,
And sometimes as a quack is seen;
The rostrum he delights to enter,
The pulpit is his chosen centre.

In heathen and in Christian lands
Are idols wrought by Error's hands,
Religion speaks—Truth must succumb,
And Reason be forever dumb;
What priests assert none must deny,
And old traditions cannot lie.
Here opens Superstition's portal
To realms where Error is immortal!

While in our daily walks we meet
With falsehood, treachery, and deceit,—
While base deception gains renown,
And truth and right are trampled down;—
While wide abroad are sown the seeds
Of countless superstitious creeds,—
Oh tell us not, ye would-be wise!
That truth survives and error dies.

GLIMPSES.

The "Congressional Petition" foots up 2,801 names in all; the "Massachusetts Petition" foots up 4,197 names.

A bill was introduced into the Wisconsin Legislature on Jan. 26, providing that churches and private schools shall be hereafter taxed.

Just as we are going to press, the telegraph announces the death of Dr. Strauss, the world-famous author of the Leben Jesu. A sincerer, manlier spirit never left its impress on any age.

Mr. Stevens resumes this week his "Notes and Comments," to our own great satisfaction, and, we suspect, to the still greater satisfaction of our readers, who will be pleased to know that his health was greatly improved by his month's stay in Cincinnati.

On account of the hearing accorded to the Boston Liberal League by the Joint Special Committee of the Massachusetts Legislature on Equal and Just Taxation, which takes place to-day (Thursday) at 10 A. M., our lecture in the Horticultural Hall course will be postponed, Mr. Alcott having kindly consented to lecture in our stead next Sunday.

It is well for all who believe in religious liberty to see how many men of high position in State and Church are willing to identify themselves publicly with the movement to turn the United States Constitution into a creed for the suppression of liberty. Read the long list of officials and dignitaries who sign the "call for a National Convention" to further this movement, copied in another column; and ponder as you read.

Names attached to the "Congressional Petition" against exemption of church property from taxation have been received at this Office as follows since last week: From S. Smith Chase, Fall River, Mass., 73; from John Gage, ——, 50; from Nath. Little, Newbury, Mass., 29; from Leonard Church, Ashfield, Mass., 54; from N. Frank White, Springfield, Mass., 40; from N. S. Lillie, Boston, 30; from Jonathan Drake, Leominster, Mass., 67 (in addition to the 238 previously forwarded). Total for the week—343 names.

Col. Higginson's lecture on "Philanthropy: the Word, its Origin, and its Meanings," was reported inaccurately in the Globe, and of course the inaccuracies were copied into The Index by our faithful compositors. There was no help for that, as we were obliged to depend on a second-hand source. But the reports of the Sunday Afternoon Lectures have been so meagre and wretched this year, that, failing to be favored with the original manuscripts, we have not thought it worth while to continue republishing the former.

With reference to a casual statement in his note, published in The Index a few weeks ago, that his society is the "largest liberal (or Unitarian) society in England," Mr. Conway wishes it understood that he meant by these words "to except Mr. Voysey's congregation, which I am glad to say is very flourishing, but who rejects the name 'Unitarian.' Nor, perhaps, should South Place Chapel be so called, though it is technically an old Unitarian foundation. I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of my statement, but still may possibly be mistaken."

Names attached to the "Massachusetts Petition" have been received at this Office since last week as follows: From N. Frank White, Springfield, 92; from A. A. Wheelock, Worcester, 60; from Nath. Little, Newbury, 28; from S. Nickerson, South Harwich, 17; from Leonard Church, Ashfield, 55; from J. L. Otis, Leeds, 24; from George R. Frepry, Boston, 22; from Jonathan Drake, Leominster, 69 (in addition to the 238 sent before); from S. Smith Chase, Fall River, 73. Total for the week—440 names. P.S.—Since the above was in type, a list of 158 names has been received from the Banner of Light, making 598 in all.

In Hillsborough, Ohio, they have invented a new device for killing intemperance. The men hold a prayer-meeting in one of the churches, while the women march round town from saloon to saloon, and improvise in each a little prayer-meeting of their own for the purpose of shaming the proprietor out of his wickedness! Whenever one of these valorous Christians in the church, who send out their women to fight in their stead while they themselves keep out of danger, concludes a prayer, the church bell is rung, to let the women know that the men have not adjourned to some one of the just visited saloons. They think it safer to do all the visiting themselves.

A petition, numerously signed, has been laid before Congress, proposing the appointment of a National "Commission of Inquiry" in regard to the position and results of the liquor traffic and of temperance legislation. It was urged, at a hearing before the judiciary committee, by Mr. A. M. Powell, and others, in a series of very temperate and careful speeches. It is not proposed or desired to have this Commission committed in advance to any prohibitory law; but it is proposed to put upon it a physician, a lawyer, a business man, a "representative of the moral sentiment of the country," and a liquor-dealer. It is proposed that all these should serve at their own expense, costing the Government nothing; and it certainly seems a feasible and important measure. T. W. H.

If anybody fancies that Orthodoxy is dead, we refer him to a recent sermon in Chicago by Rev. C. L. Thompson, who says with vigor: "I shall aim to show that the corpse of the Westminster Confession, which a Unitarian brother was so anxious to have buried, is the 'liveliest corpse' on record." So he goes on to argue that "the Bible is not on trial before the world—the world is on trial before the Bible;" and that Orthodox Christianity is "a finished and perfect salvation." This is a summary of the creed which Mr. Thompson puts into the mouth of his lively corpse: "The high priests of the world's culture have not been Buddha, Zoroaster, Aristotle, or Plotinus. They have been Moses and David, Paul and John, Augustine and Calvin, Luther and Zwinglius, Bacon and Milton. The doctrinal stakes which have marked the high tide of thought have been One God, Maker of heaven and earth, Jesus Christ, His son, our Savior, the Holy Spirit, author of our regeneration, the forgiveness of sins, the communion of saints, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting."

An editorial writer in the Christian Register argues that, although church property was in a fair way to be taxed with the approval of the churches themselves, the churches will soon be found on the other side of this question, if "the injudicious course of partisans" now agitating for non-exemption is continued. He refers to our own incidental statement, at the last meeting of the Boston Liberal League, that the fundamental aim of the churches is not so much to foster morality as to quicken faith in the personal Jesus, as Lord and Savior; which we characterized as "vain superstition." This is the substance of the Register's criticism; and we have a very short reply to make. If the churches and their journals turn against what they themselves concede to be a just measure, for the reason that some of its advocates say things which they disapprove,—if tenderness for their own "superstition" thus deters them from joining in a confessedly righteous reform,—it will be sufficiently evident that what we said was true; that the churches are more attached to their own superstition than they are to morality and justice. The sincerity of their professions of regard for equity in this matter will be put to a crucial test, when the reform approaches its goal.

FREEDOM "IRRELIGIOUS."

Our readers will find on another page an article with the caption "The Irreligious Amendment," copied from the Christian Statesman, of Philadelphia. It is worthy of their thoughtful attention.

To this confession have the advocates of the Christian Amendment been brought at last, that [confounding religion with Christianity] freedom is irreligious. "The silence of the Constitution," says the Statesman, "has at length emboldened the enemies of Christianity to demand that it speak out in their favor." What has been demanded? That into the Constitution shall be incorporated any denial of the Christian creed, or any affirmation of a creed opposed to it? No! Nothing has been demanded but that the question of creed shall never enter as an element into the determination of any civil or political right; that no man shall be disfranchised, or disqualified for office, or prejudiced in any public or private station, by reason of his honest thought on religious subjects; that the organic law of the land shall recognize and allow no interference with the liberty of the citizen to follow the dictates of his own reason and conscience, so long as he respects the rights of his fellowmen. And this demand, forsooth, is "irreligious"! To be as scrupulously tender of the rights of Christians as of non-Christians or anti-Christians,—to seek protection for all alike, be their religious beliefs what they may, in the exercise of their own intelligence and moral sense,—this is to convict the "enemies of Christianity" of a fell purpose to make the Constitution "speak out in their favor"! Who, then, are the "enemies of Christianity" but all who believe in universal religious freedom; and what is "Christianity" but a settled resolve to rob men of it? The Constitution would simply be made to "speak out" in favor of freedom; could our oft-reiterated declaration that Christianity and freedom are at deadly variance be more overwhelmingly demonstrated? Or could the aim of the Christianizers be proved more conclusively to be a purpose to bow the whole nation under the iron yoke of their own creed? Let it be seen clearly, and remembered tenaciously, that they who would make this people Christian by Christianizing its organic law hold that FREEDOM IS IRRELIGIOUS.

Irreligious! What, then, is religion? Is it tyranny? Is it despotism? Is it setting your heel on the neck of your brother, because he obeys the laws of his own nature, and of all Nature, by faithfully following the truth as best he sees it? Fool that we were to fancy that thus alone could any man be in the core of his heart religious! Now we are instructed that religion is the denial of freedom, and freedom the denial of religion. So much the worse, then, for religion! Pillory the pretender, if that is the infamous wretch! Give us a world which reverences the rights of man, and throws religion, like physic, to the dogs! Give us a humanity which knows at least how to be true to itself,—which braves devils and gods alike in the pursuit of the true, the beautiful, the good!

But this is defamation of religion. The only "Religious Amendment" is that which guarantees the free humanity of man. Alas for the blindness which confounds religion with the itching for power! The name is nothing, but the fact is all; and the fact which America stands for is the sacredness of that which the Christianizing crusaders of to-day denounce as "irreligious." We recognize their energy, their enthusiasm, their self-devotion, their burning zeal in a bad cause; but the Christianity they would enthrone is the old demon of ecclesiastical ambition, tricked out as an angel of light. We have seen them, listened to them, caught in their spoken and printed words the ring of true manliness and high resolve; but none the less must we deplore the fanatical persistence with which they are sedulously fanning the embers of the world's expiring discords, and doing their best to wrap this Western hemisphere in the flames of religious hate. We would not harm a hair of their heads, or lay a feather's weight on their backs as they piously go through the motions of climbing their impossible Zion; but when they strive to pile the mountain of Christian superstition on the Magna Charta of this free land, and to crush out liberty in the name of religion, we warn them that their usurping Bible and Christ will have short shrift at the hands of an exasperated people, and the "irreligion" they dread will trample their idols out of sight in the resistless march of America to freedom, justice and truth.

Yet in this one point the Christianizers show an unerring instinct. The great battle between the ideas of the State and the ideas of the Church will indeed be fought out in the "organic law of the nation." The long and bitter conflict of chattel-slavery with free industry began in the world of ideas, passed to the arena of politics, burst into the hell of war, and expired in the peaceful suffrages by which Freedom was enthroned in the Constitution. The old story will be repeated, for it is the same old conflict in a new guise,—though we hope and would fain believe that the dreaded possibility of another civil war is in fact an impossibility. But that the agitation now begun can find no end until either Christianity or Freedom shall have moulded the Constitution wholly into its own likeness, is one of the fatalities to be read in the very nature of the conflicting principles. The battle of the Amendments is at hand; a thousand minor issues hide it from sight; but none the less it approaches year by year, month by month, day by day. Cowardice to the rear—courage to the front!

DEFORMED REFORMERS.

At a Woman's Suffrage Convention held in Washington, January 15 and 16, the following resolution was adopted:—

Resolved, That it is with indignation and shame that we note the fact that, while Congress consumes the people's time and money in unending discussions of a Civil Rights Bill for men of color, not a plea has been introduced for women, whose political, civil, religious and social rights are denied in every State in the Union.

Subsequently a "Bill of Rights," was introduced by Mrs. Stanton. I copy all but the last clause, it having been rejected by the Convention.

A BILL OF RIGHTS.

Resolved, That, in National Convention assembled, the women of the several States demand of Congress a Civil Rights Bill for their protection:

1. That shall secure to them equally with colored men all the advantages and opportunities of life.
2. That shall open to them Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Princeton, and all the higher institutions of learning, with equal rights with colored men, to become both students and professors.
3. That shall compel the medical profession to admit women into all their colleges and societies, to practise in the hospitals, and in every way recognize them as equals precisely as they do men of color.
4. That shall open to them the law schools, with the right for married and unmarried women to practise in all our courts on the same terms with colored men; to sit upon juries, to sue and be sued, and to testify in our courts as do colored men; to be tried by a jury of their peers; and to be made eligible to all the honors and emoluments of the bar and bench.
5. To be admitted to all theological seminaries on equal terms with colored men; to be recognized in all religious organizations as bishops, elders, priests, deacons; to officiate at the altar and preach in the pulpits of all churches, orthodox or heterodox; and that all religious sects shall be compelled to bring their creeds and biblical interpretations into line with the divine idea of the absolute equality of women with the colored men of the nation.
6. That women, equally with colored men, shall be protected in all their uprisings and down-sittings and in all their outgoings and incomings; that they be admitted to theatres and hotels alone; that they may walk the streets by night or day; ramble in the forests, or beside the lakes and rivers, as do colored men, without fear or molestation or insult from any white men whatsoever; and that women, the same as colored men, shall have equal place and pay in the world of work; be admitted into whatever trade or occupation they desire as apprentices, journeymen, masters; and if any white man refuse to work beside a woman as an equal he shall suffer fine and imprisonment, precisely as if he refused to work beside a colored man.

I do not propose to make any extended comment upon this muddle. If it is intended for burlesque or satire, it degrades the good cause the author professes to advocate; if seriously offered for the consideration of intelligent people, a simple reproduction of it in the columns of a paper devoted to freedom is sufficient exposure of the bigotry and absurdity of its propositions.

A Convention that could entertain a resolution calling upon Congress to compel all religious sects to adopt certain "biblical interpretations" could only be inspired by a spirit essentially vicious and intolerant, and this spirit becomes even more conspicuous when we note the attitude of the Convention toward the colored race.

The rights of women can never be secured to them by belittling the just demands of any other oppressed class. The Civil Rights Bill now under discussion in Congress seeks to place black men upon an equality with white men, and black women upon an equality with white women. The true spirit of reform would commend this effort.

Negrophobia finds natural vent in the acts and speeches of ex-rebels and slave-holders, and its victims are entitled to our pity, if not consideration; but when a Woman's Suffrage Convention, composed largely of Northern men and women, and conducted in part by men and women heretofore prominent as abolitionists,—when such a Convention appeals to the vulgar prejudice against the negro, it forfeits all claim to respect, and stabs the cause it pretends to serve.

PROF. CHARLES R. CROSS' LECTURES ON SOUND.

Among the principal advantages of life in Boston should certainly be counted the privilege of attending the Lowell Institute Lectures. The great superiority of these lectures arises from the fact that, not being dependent on his audience for support, the lecturer need not seek to catch popular favor by superficial brilliancy, but can treat his subject thoroughly, and at sufficient length to give a full and adequate idea of it.

A very interesting course is now in progress at the Technological Institute by Prof. Cross. It is to consist of eighteen lectures on the Laws of Sound. The lectures are fully illustrated by numerous interesting experiments. Prof. Cross is a comparatively young man, educated at the Institute, and is not yet very widely known; but he seems likely to take a high rank as a lecturer and an experimenter.

His manner in the lecture-room is free and unembarrassed, and also very simple and unpretending. His style of explanation is concise and clear, and, instead of reiterating his statements to weariness, he secures a full understanding of the principles he enforces by the variety of his illustrations. He is very careful in the preparation of his experiments, and almost never fails to produce the result which he expects.

His last lecture on the "Pitch of Musical Instruments" was a very delightful one, and full of interest to all lovers of music. I think it would be very interesting even to a popular audience of any culture, although apart from the rest of the course, if it could be illustrated by his admirable apparatus.

He spoke quite fully in conclusion of the curious circumstance, well known to musicians, that the standard pitch of instruments varies in different countries, and has risen pretty steadily since the time of Handel, so that all Handel's music is now really played a semitone higher than it is written; and, unless we transpose it into a different key, we are not giving the very music which the great composer had in his mind.

The lecture on Saturday, Jan. 24, took up the attractive subject of sensitive flames which Tyndall has familiarized us with, and for which Prof. Cross has prepared very fine illustrations with great care.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I observe with satisfaction that one of the "Demands of Liberalism," as set forth in the programme of the Liberal League, deals with a very old grievance not yet abolished on either side of the Atlantic. No. 6 runs thus: "We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the Government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead."

Much has been said and written on this subject already, and I can hardly hope to say anything new or important upon it. Nevertheless, there is nothing like hammering perpetually at a weak point till it gives away.

The old idea of an oath involved an imprecation of divine vengeance upon the swearer's head, if he should bear false witness.

It was understood that God was expected to smite the perjurer with sudden death, after having called on heaven to testify to his words. This fear of sudden death was of course aggravated by the vision of hell fire into which all liars were to be cast; and we cannot well doubt that the solemnity of an oath under these conditions did exert in many instances a beneficial, though temporary, effect in forcing a person, who was by habit untruthful, to speak "the whole truth, and nothing but the truth"—for once. But in exact proportion to this benefit secured, the practice wrought incalculable moral harm. The inevitable inferences from it would be that God took a special and peculiar interest in litigation; and only cared to have the whole truth spoken and no lies told in the courts of law and equity. It would naturally be inferred that, if it was only dangerous to tell a lie upon oath, it could not be dangerous to tell any number of lies in ordinary matters and when the speaker had not sworn.

Conceive for a moment what would have been the moral effect of elevating to the same rank of importance with the oath the common declarations passing daily between man and man! However dreadful the conception of the divine wrath, it would have done some good service in the cultivation of truthfulness; whereas the very fact of singling out certain occasions on which truthfulness was especially required led men to think that on other occassions, not specified, truthfulness was unnecessary, or, at least, comparatively unimportant.

The use of oaths, then, I declare to have been a very great moral injury to the people among whom the practice of judicial swearing prevailed. That is, on the hypothesis of the popular religious belief being true.

Now that that belief about God's wrath, and the lake of fire and brimstone, is passing away, the mischief of swearing in the courts, and so forth, wears a new aspect. Thousands take that oath without believing in God or hell fire, committing an act of grossest perjury as the preliminary ceremony of giving evidence. People do not like to be singular, and so professing Christians who are utter sceptics will readily take the New Testament into their hands, and, kissing the book, will enact a deliberate falsehood by which judge, jury, and the bar are all alike deceived.

In England, I believe, no man now is compelled to take an oath, if he refuses to do so on conscientious grounds, and will give a solemn assurance that he will speak only what is true to the best of his knowledge and belief. Still this partial relief does not meet the real evil of this system, which tends inevitably to make a distinction between occasions on which one may speak falsely and those on which one must speak the truth.

People have not sufficiently awakened to the fact that more than three-fourths of litigation arises from falsehood, from some one or more having told or enacted lies, and from the general untrustworthiness of men and women when their own interest or greed is at stake. This prevailing untruthfulness outside the courts of law is due in a great measure to the practice of judicial oaths.

Gentlemen, i.e., men of honor, are of course out of reach of this pernicious influence; but the very ignorant and degraded classes cannot be easily dispossessed of the prejudice which leads them to regard their word as of high value under an oath, and of none at all without it.

When they are not believed, their first impulse is to drive home conviction with a black eye. The fist is the great confirmator of all doubted assertions.

We are yet barbarians while we cling to these pagan customs, and we are without excuse for doing so, long after the mischief of them has been exposed.

Of course, at present, there must be pains and penalties inflicted for perjury or false statement within the walls of a court of law. Just as we have laws to punish "brawling" in churches and places of worship, so we should have severe penalties against the outrages of falsehood on the sanctity of the seat of justice. But let us hope that, with the abolition of the oath, a new era would set in, in which good taste and high principle should so prevail that perjurers should be as rare as "brawlers."

We are already beginning to have laws in England against lying, in trade, and so forth. Soon all dishonesty of word or deed must share the same reprobation as belongs now to false swearing.

Don't you think America would be none the worse for a movement in this direction also?

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Members of the Free Religious Association are reminded that the subscription fees of many of them are now due. It is hoped that all will renew their annual subscriptions, and that many new names may be entered on the roll. One dollar is the fee for annual membership, but a larger sum will not be refused. Subscriptions may be sent to the undersigned, New Bedford, Mass., or to R. P. Hallowell, Treasurer, 89 Commercial Street, Boston, Mass.

A MAN WITH some wit and a very long nose met a neighbor one frosty morning, who sang out, "Halloo, Smith! I met the end of your nose back here a piece, and saw it was completely frozen." "No fault of mine," said the undisturbed Smith; "I rubbed it as far as I could reach."

COMMON-SENSE IN RELIGION: A Series of Essays. By James Freeman Clarke. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1874.

Common sense in religion, taking the term in its full extent, would embrace the universal sense of mankind on subjects of a religious nature. This would naturally lead to the extracting from each religion that in which all agree, and that which might well be considered as containing in the aggregate the most truth and the best elements which the human mind has been capable of attaining.

This would, indeed, be the common sense of humanity, and the only sense in which its conclusions could be considered authoritative.

It would constitute the basis of a Universal Religion, founded upon the highest conceptions of the Infinite—the ideal perfect, including the duty of man, and fellowship among all human beings.

Taking the term in a more limited use, who shall say which, among the numerous religions of the world, and the many sects embraced in each, is to claim the prerogative of deciding the matter for the rest of the world? But, regarding it within the bounds of any one system of religion, Christianity for instance, and taking the common sense of that body for a guide, that is, the sense of the majority, at what do we arrive? Simply that the most numerous sect in it must settle the matter for all the others. Against this the freedom of the individual soul rebels. It refuses to surrender to any authority whatever the convictions of its reason, which are dear to it as life itself. Yet, granting the right of the majority to rule, what would be the result as to all progress? What would have been the fate of Christianity itself? How would Protestantism have arisen out of Catholicism, Puritanism from Anglicanism, or Unitarianism from Orthodoxy? With a wonderful deduction from the statement made by the author of Common-Sense in Religion, in the outset, that, "by common sense in theology, he means that part of Christian truth which has been taken up into the average mind of Christendom," he labors all through the work to establish a system of Unitarian theology, and concludes with asserting, after summing up the general principles of that faith, that "this is what the religion of common sense teaches, and this alone can make men regard each other as brethren," thus making "Liberal Christianity" and the religion of common sense identical.

The work, throughout, is characterized by assumption rather than argument, assertion rather than proof. Bible statements are taken as unquestionable authority, and the author of the work is assumed to be their qualified interpreter. There is nothing new or original in the treatment of the subject, and nothing that indicates great profundity of thought. The author seems as thoroughly "settled down" on the plane to which he has advanced as are the Orthodox on theirs. The two planes, indeed, seem little removed from each other. Both are planted upon the same ground, and neither is free. The object of the work does not seem to be so much to find out what is truth as to build up supposed truths. The author says: "We have a profound conviction that the possibilities of man are exhaustless"—"We are expecting new developments of the human soul"—"Faith in the power of the human soul is the principle of human progress;" yet, when it comes to religion, it would seem that here we have arrived at a finality. This faith, too, in human nature, he asserts, is attained only through Christ; he holds that our hope for ourselves has its soul in Christ's hope concerning us, and that the spirit of invention and progress can come only through Christianity. He speaks of God's permitting the Chicago fire as a mystery, but that we can see that from it comes (as compensatory) courage, patience, faith. So the mystery of sin leads to more abounding grace. He incidentally concedes that God may be found through science: "God," he says, "has put all things under his [man's] feet, by giving him the power of rising out of the single fact into the universal law. The result of all is, that at last we reach the knowledge of the most universal law, the Infinite Cause, and so know God." . . . "If men of science only knew it, they would see that they are ignorantly worshipping God when they worship law. It is not necessary for them to abandon science in order to be religious. Let their science be filled with love, and that is religion. The lecture-room may be made a temple; the most abstract mathematics become a liturgy; the cabinet of geology, mineralogy, botany, a chapel filled with more sacred relics than the bones of dead saints, because they are relics of God's presence, and bear the marks of his creating thought and forming hand." Other beautiful passages like the above might be cited. Speaking of heaven, he says: "It is not dependent on time or place, but is the state of the soul communing with God and eternity. Its essence is that love which is the power of going out of one's self in sympathy with others. It is giving one's self in the service of others. It is joy and peace in the sight of a divine beauty and goodness which flows into all things. When we love others with a true and noble love, it is because we see in them something divine. The object of love is, therefore, always the eternal beauty. To this divine beauty, we gladly sacrifice ourselves, and find it more blessed to give than to receive." He occupies much space in repeating familiar ideas as to a hereafter. His best words in relation to it are, that belief in it comes from "that confidence in God, that trust in universal law, in the order of the universe, in a pervading, providing intelligence, in a blessed fatherly love, which is the root of all intellectual activity, all intellectual progress." In his essay, "On not Being Afraid," he counsels his readers not to be afraid of free inquiry; yet, at the same time, he assumes that Christianity is founded upon a rock, and must forever firmly stand. "THE INDEX" AND SPIRITUALISM.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

I have just read, with great pleasure, your editorial on "Toleration" in THE INDEX of the 29th. One cannot, however, read such an article without making a personal application of its ideas and principles to his neighbors—overlooking himself, of course. In this vein it occurs to me: hasn't there always been a very decided "air of restrained omniscience" in the tone and tendency of THE INDEX in some directions, and particularly in relation to Spiritualism? It seems to say, not "I am holier than thou," but "my culture and intellectual attainments place me immeasurably above you." There is no voice of criticism or rebuke or ridicule, but a pervading tone of, as you aptly term it, endurance.

No honest Spiritualist can complain that THE INDEX or its editors do not accept or persistently advocate the belief held by Spiritualists; but I think many Spiritualists feel hurt (perhaps without good reason) that the work Spiritualism has done in the quarter of a century past, in the same direction, is apparently overlooked by THE INDEX. Every intellectual and practical thought THE INDEX contains is ardently and entirely reëchoed and sustained by the Spiritualists of the United States. But when this organized faith has for twenty-five years, quietly, persistently, and in the face of ridicule and animadversion, advocated the same freedom in religion and thought which characterizes the Free Religious Association, would not an occasional acknowledgment of its position be well? It has been beautifully said that "true culture is kindliness of feeling"—is the power of transporting oneself into the condition of another. I believe that even in this sense THE INDEX is entitled to be considered the exponent and organ of the cultivated free thought of the country; and that it is only in its zeal and devotion that it seems sometimes cold and supercilious to a kindred worker in the same great cause.

Every organization of Spiritualists throughout the country is a "Liberal Club," in THE INDEX sense, and has been so for twenty-five years. Had it not been for these liberal clubs, where to-day would be THE INDEX and its supporters? Perhaps with no more power than any city literary club. Spiritualism numbers millions in the United States, and Mr. Frothingham has justly and nobly acknowledged it as an unquestionable power outside of Christianity,—a "fact of vast moment," one that has "already demoralized Orthodox Protestantism beyond repair." Spiritual*ists*, if not ism, have come to be treated, too, by the daily press quite fairly, and as a power that is. The late lectures of Gerald Massey were promptly and fully reported. Even the New York Express, with its strong High Church proclivities, in an editorial a few days ago, says: "Spiritualism is attracting unusual attention," and alludes to the recognition of it by Mr. Frothingham and Dr. Bartol, and more especially to the statements lately made by Mr. Crookes, the well-known English scientist and chemist.

Now, Mr. Editor, I would say that I am an especial admirer of THE INDEX. I like every word I find in it, and, if I should sometimes be glad to see something more in it, it is not in a spirit of fault-finding, but with an earnest desire for its success and for the union of all kindred elements of thought and action in it and through it. J. S. P.

PORTLAND, Me.

[If what we said about "toleration" was an unsuspected reproof of our own tone in treating the Spiritualists, we must with the best grace possible play the part of a "dreadful example" of the fault noted; but we will try to exemplify now the better tone we commended by thanking J. S. P. for his kindly criticism. To be honest about it, we are still unconscious of having at any time "tolerated" Spiritualists, when we have always meant to recognize the equal rights of all to believe, or utter, or work for, whatever seems to them to be true. We have been repeatedly lashed in private for a supposed leaning to Spiritualism, and even for our openly avowed willingness to work with Spiritualists in the cause of freedom; and we have been about as severely blamed for a supposed leaning to Materialism. Perhaps nothing would really please either set of critics but our conversion to their own belief; and it would be impossible to gratify both. Meanwhile we confess frankly that we take little interest in any of the isms as such, while we are drawn by irresistible sympathy to every man, woman, and child that manifests devotion to universal principles and free ideas. Spiritualism, it is true, has emancipated thousands from the old creeds, because the doctrine of "spirit intercourse" abolishes the old Heaven and Hell; but the services done by Spiritualists to the cause of freedom we attribute to them, not as Spiritualists, but simply as emancipated men and women. No Spiritualist should feel hurt because we cannot conscientiously refer his liberality, his friendliness to progress, his zeal for freedom, and so forth, to his Spiritualism; we applaud these things in all who manifest them, and refer them to our common humanity set free from dogmatic thraldom. Under the name "liberal," "radical," "free-thinker," and so forth, we include every such Spiritualist as J. S. P.; and we recognize his worth and his services whenever we commend the qualities denoted by those terms. Is not that enough? Such general terms express general principles which are common to a great many people with a great many isms; and no ism whatever is justly entitled to the credit of what these principles do for mankind. Let us, as men and women, not be unwilling to forget our isms in brave service of our principles.—ED.]

THE WASHINGTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

Another League is organized, consisting of fifty-five members. At the conclusion of my month's labors in Washington, D. C., Jan. 25, I had the honor to organize the "Washington Liberal League," although a perusal of the daily papers next morning rendered the "honor" uncertain—provided we put faith in the press. A couple of the dailies published the nine "Demands of Liberalism," for which they should be credited, perhaps. The Evening Star headed the "Demands" with the misleading term, "Communism, etc., in Washington."

The Chronicle styles the Demands "A Rotten Platform." The National Republican publishes them under this heading: "The Red Flag;" and a subhead, "Organization of a Liberal League in this City." The officers are: President, George M. Wood; Vice-President, George Holmes; Secretary, Josephine E. Crawford; Treasurer, W. H. Burr.

There is no point in the whole nation where there is so great a necessity for such an organization. Here is a powerful Young Men's Christian Association, and a strong Roman Catholic influence.

The first work of the League will be to circulate a petition to secure the taxation of Church property in the District of Columbia. Yours respectfully,

W. F. JAMIESON.

DRED SCOTT AND TANEY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Your correspondent, Mr. Conkling, doubts whether I am a lawyer. I know that he is one, judging from his evasive statements. Half the truth will often have the effect of a whole lie. None so familiar with this fact as lawyers.

You will please observe that Mr. Conkling does not deny any one of the statements I made. He knows he cannot do so. His method of reply is to wander off to other points.

I said that Dred Scott was held to be a slave, and was denied the right to sue at all. Mr. Conkling allows this; only he wraps it up in technical terms and statement. It is true, as he says, that Scott sued Mr. Sandford, who claimed to be his master, for assault, in the Circuit Court of Missouri. That court decided against him and in favor of Mr. Sandford. Scott appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. Taney held that Scott was a slave, and so had no right to sue at all, and flung the case out of court. This is a plain statement of the case in common words, such as everybody can understand. This "decision," Mr. Conkling says, was in "Scott's favor." If being flung out of court, and denied the right to sue at all, is winning one's case, how does one ever lose a case? Mr. Conkling is only trying to throw dust in men's eyes, until he can deny the above statement—which he has not done, but indeed admits it, though in such technical terms as will confuse ordinary readers. From the above plain statement of the essential facts of the case, which Mr. Conkling does not deny, your readers can judge whether the decision was in Scott's favor.

In regard to Mr. Conkling's other point—Taney's infamous epigram—Mr. Conkling's quotation is worth nothing, because he does not quote enough. After those remarks, which you print, regarding the public opinion of our revolutionary days, and the assertion that men then held that negroes "had no rights which the white man was bound to respect," Taney goes on to say that, in consequence of this state of things, the Declaration of Independence did not intend to embrace the negro race in its principles, but "excluded them from civilized governments and the family of nations."

And, further, that the Constitution was formed in accordance with this same public opinion and was to be interpreted in obedience to it, and never "intended to confer on them [the negroes] or their posterity the blessings of liberty or any of the personal rights so carefully provided for the citizen,"—with much more to the same effect. Hence the nation was perfectly justified in asserting that Taney ruled that under our Constitution the negro had no rights which the white man was bound to respect. For that was the essence of the statement upon which he rested his decision.

The class of men is too large in this country who dare unblushingly to risk any atrocity of conduct, and to throw the whole weight of courts and the Government against a hated victim, so long as public opinion is on their side. But when that changes, and brands their acts as they deserve, then these men try to dodge responsibility by hair-splitting and legal equivocation. Fortunately in this case the record is too distinct and black and damning to leave any such chance of escape. Taney's memory blackens, day by day, with this stain—a judge who manufactured laws out of base prejudice, and rested it on gross misstatement of facts. How far his ignorance may excuse his wickedness, Mr. Conkling and his other friends can discuss at their leisure. But the fact remains that Taney tried to make his court the tool of tyrants, and succeeded only in disgracing himself.

[We regret to say that Hon. Alfred Conkling, of Utica, N. Y., has just died at the age of eighty-five years. The above caustic letter is a reply to his last article in THE INDEX; and if higher than personal interests did not require that both sides of the subject should be fully presented, we should request the writer to withhold his article under the circumstances. As it is, we feel bound by our promise to publish it. —ED.]

PROPOSITIONS FOR REFERENCE.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Can you oblige me so far as to publish the enclosed letter? It was addressed to the editor of the Register, but is declined, as others have been, I believe, not because he is unwilling such a communication should be printed there, but because he considers that he has publicly closed the discussion of the excision of Mr. Potter's name from the Year Book of the Unitarian Association.

My objection to the treatment of this question by the Register was, not that it took a positive ground which I dissented from; nor even that it did not appear to apprehend the real nature or the gravity of the question opened by the action of the Year Book committee; but that it did not seem to me to open its columns hospitably to a discussion of the issue raised by the Fox-Potter correspondence; that, as the organ of Unitarianism, it did not fully respect the right of a respectable portion of Unitarians to appear there freely. This right, on a question of the fundamental organization of our denomination, it should have jealously guarded, even going to an extreme, if need be, to justify our claim as a denomination to the title of liberal.

I do not, however, address myself to you to enter a complaint of the Register's course, which I know, if mistaken, was dictated by no unworthy motive or impulse. I do, however, wish that the protest contained in my letter to the Register should be made public; and there is no other journal interested in the controversy, except your own, to which I can appeal. I come to you the more readily because I would gladly vindicate in the eyes of your supporters the character of Unitarianism, which was not born to be illiberal, and which many respectable members of our clergy and laity are earnestly determined shall not become so. Although I am not a supporter, nor even a subscriber, of THE INDEX, I therefore beg the favor (if it be not too onerous a one for you to grant) of your printing the enclosure.

Truly yours,

JOSEPH MAY.

NEWBURYPORT, Mass., Feb. 4, 1874.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:

DEAR FRIEND,—I am sorry that you should have been so pestered with the complaints of those who have desired to choke off discussion on the omission of Mr. Potter's name from the Year Book published by the American Unitarian Association. That discussion has not seemed to me to attain such proportions as have justified even your own anxiety to close it, or by any means to exhaust the subject. It has consisted in your publishing the letters between Messrs. Fox and Potter, which were a piece of news not to be withheld from the denomination of which you are the organ; and in printing a very few and brief letters from those who oppose Mr. Fox's proceeding, in a not prominent portion of your paper; with a few editorials. Surely so radical a measure, and one so unprecedented, was never more readily dismissed.

I do not propose now to comment on your share in this discussion further than to remark, first, that I have been greatly surprised at what seems to me your want of appreciation of the gravity of this question, a totally new one in Unitarian history; and, second, that your line of argument did not touch the real question at issue, which was, and is, not whether the Unitarian denomination, as an organized body, stands, and ought to stand, on a broad Christian confession,—which is not disputed; but whether the denomination shall, and ought to, adopt the principle of excommunication for dissent,—which is eminently a question to be debated.

My only wish now is, without debate, to put on record two simple propositions before you finally shut down your columns on this painful subject.

I. The principle of free inquiry in religion has been an integral element in Unitarianism from its origin. It is more characteristic of Channing and the early Unitarians than even their theological view. I have been born and bred in Unitarianism, and have almost breathed no other atmosphere; and I bear witness that, from my infancy to my graduation from our oldest theological school, this principle was, by every teacher I ever encountered, sedulously inculcated as the primary right and duty of every mind, and the gauge of every conviction. Even the historical and spiritual truth of Christianity has been unvaryingly presented to my mind, by all my Unitarian teachers, as subject to it.

II. The excision of a clergyman's name from the list printed in the Year Book of the American Unitarian Association is by no means the same thing as his own exclusion from the Unitarian body, or its ministry. That list is prepared by officers, or an officer, of a merely executive organization. Surely the clergy of the Unitarian Church, graduated at her schools, and ordained by her divines, are not going to acknowledge themselves liable to excommunication by a body of men, or a man, whom they may themselves make or unmake at an annual meeting! The only effect of the action of the official editing the last Year Book has therefore been, first, to offer an indignity to a regularly ordained Unitarian clergyman of distinguished scholarship, ability, and purity of character, and the prominent Unitarian church of which he is the pastor; second, to furnish to the denomination a mutilated and therefore untrustworthy list of our clergy; third, to furnish to the Free Religious Association precisely the raison d'être which some of us have denied that it has had, and which its supporters will have triumphantly found, if this action of the officials of the Unitarian Association shall be approved by that body, or by the National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches at its next meeting. Very truly yours,

JOSEPH MAY.

NEWBURYPORT, Feb. 2, 1874.

THE CHANNING AND PARKER TYPE.

A recent number of the Liberal Christian announced that Robert Collyer pronounces Abraham Lincoln to have been a Unitarian of the Channing and Theodore Parker type. The statement is a somewhat puzzling one. It contains what we used to be taught were incompatible terms. That Abraham Lincoln was a person of independent habits of thought in regard to religion, as everything else, is familiar to every one. It is not difficult, therefore, to credit that he renounced the doctrine of the Trinity and its correlative conceptions. But that it follows that he was a Unitarian of the Channing type seems to us unsustained either by logic or any information as to his opinions disclosed. If a Unitarian of the Channing type, then it is very clear he was not one of the Parker type. Both he could not have been at the same time. Indeed, the closer his agreement with the latter, the further from Unitarianism he would be. That there was a correspondence between Channing and Parker, much nearer than Unitarians generally have been inclined to admit, there is little doubt,—but it was one simply of spirit. Channing thus contemplated, like his great successor, was essentially a radical, though conservative Unitarianism, in its adoption of his name as the exponent of the phase of Unitarianism it represents, has always, with a singular nonchalance, ignored or forgotten this.

The intellectual positions of Channing and Parker, nevertheless, were wide apart. Channing was a firm believer in supernaturalism through his whole life. Theodore Parker believed in naturalism, and that alone. Channing believed in the perfection of Jesus, the infallibility of his teachings, and his religion as a final system, as thoroughly as his Orthodox contemporaries. Parker, on the other hand, rejected all of these things; maintained that Jesus was simply a human being, and, although a superior one, yet with a human being's limitations and imperfections,—that his teachings were not infallible, but affected by the ideas and errors of his time, and hence incompetent to fulfil the Christian expectation, and become the ultimate religion of the race. The Unitarian denomination showed little love of Theodore Parker while living. It practically shut him out of its fold. It would have been fired with what would have been deemed a righteous indignation, had he assumed its name. After his famous sermon at South Boston, he said: "Most of my clerical friends fell off; some would not speak to me in the streets, and refused to take me by the hand. In their public meetings they left the sofas or benches when I sat down, and withdrew from me as Jews from contact with a leper. In a few months most of my former ministerial coadjutors forsook me. . . . The Unitarian periodicals were shut against me and my friends."

It is true, the children build monuments to the prophets whom the fathers stoned, though not always. It has not been so at least in this instance. The nearest approach to it we have seen is the new advertisement of the Liberal Christian of a crayon likeness of Mr. Parker it has just issued and commends to its patrons. The monument may come by-and-by. The Unitarian Association, up to this time, has steadily preserved a reputation free of offence to the Orthodox in its denomination, and those out of it, by refusing to put any of his works in print, though repeatedly urged to do so. The influence of Theodore Parker upon the Unitarian denomination has been most profound, but of a kind damaging to the reputation and prospects, not unfrequently, of those it affected—carrying them beyond the lines of Unitarian fellowship. Even Mr. Collyer's regard for Theodore Parker has manifested itself more in feeling, or a vague admiration of character, than an acceptance and avowal of the rationalistic conclusions to which he came. If it had been otherwise, notwithstanding his fine genius and noble qualities, we fear he might have found Unitarianism a less comfortable abiding-place.

It is less than a half dozen years since an eminent Unitarian divine, at a convention of the body, declared that, if a certain resolution before it was passed, designed to commit the denomination to broader mental freedom, he should withdraw and pursue his way henceforth "solitary and alone." Theodore Parker pursued his way solitary and alone, so far as the Christian Church—including the Unitarian branch—was concerned, to the end of his days.

It is not forgotten that, when he was on that last, sad journey of his life, from which he never returned, an ardent friend and admirer of his (Mr. Conway, now in London) proposed, at a meeting of the alumni of the Divinity School at Cambridge, to send him an expression of sympathy, accompanied with the desire that he might renew his work at the Music Hall in Boston. The proposal met with a strenuous, and somewhat bitter, opposition, and, unless our memory errs, was finally rejected. It is such considerations as the foregoing that cause our confusion in regard to the statement with which we began this communication. It is well known that its author is of a serious and unpoetic turn, and therefore it could not have been made in fun, and is not probably the product of a freak of the imagination. A year or two since, he became interested in the now neglected study of astrology, and submitted some curious calculations to his friends in this branch of research. May they not also have been brought into requisition in this instance?

Another hypothesis suggests itself. It is that his sympathies are so much more comprehensive than his denominational inclosure that he forgets it does not embrace all who are one in the fellowship of the spirit.

HELPLESS WOMAN.—The case of the alleged lunatic heiress, Maria Barto, is creating great excitement in Pennsylvania. Mrs. Barto's husband died eight years ago, and the widow became heir to immense landed estates in Montgomery and Berks Counties, Pa. She is a middle-aged, fine-looking woman, and well educated. After coming into possession of her large property, some of her friends took it into their heads that she was a lunatic. Proceedings in lunacy were instituted, she was adjudged insane and sent to an asylum. Her property was by the court placed in the hands of a committee for management. After the property had been wrested from her hands by legal measures, she was let out of the asylum and permitted to reside with her guardian in Washington township, Berks County. Here the Rev. Lewis C. Herman, a minister of the Reformed Church, saw and loved her. He was an oldish gentleman, fine-looking and interesting, good and gray, and Mrs. Barto showed her good taste and sanity by loving him in return. The couple were married, and commenced living happily together. The marriage shocked the kind friends of the heiress, and they set about procuring a divorce for the happy couple. A divorce was finally decreed on the ground that the fair widow was incapable of contracting a valid marriage. The bride was therefore snatched from the arms of her husband and taken to the home of her committee to live in single misery. The husband was warned to keep away, but the couple managed to communicate with each other by letter. She promised if she could plan an escape from her jailers she would leave the country with him forever. She did escape, met her reverend lover, and the pair went to Philadelphia and got married over again. Her relatives started like bloodhounds on her track, and the detectives soon handed the unfortunate wife over to the police authorities. The Rev. Herman now instituted proceedings for the recovery of his wife. He wanted his wife, but did not care a straw for her money. The relatives had taken care of that, any way. It was gone from him forever, but might not be lost to his heirs, if he were allowed to have any. Several counter suits were brought. Mrs. Barto-Herman was present at the trial, and exhibited no trace of lunacy. Her behavior was closely watched, but no flaw was discovered in it. Nevertheless, the court decided that the lady was insane. At this decision the helpless woman sobbed, and rushing to a female friend hung about her neck and kissed her. One of the counsel exclaimed, as she did so, it was very evident from her actions she was crazy. She was sent to the lunatic asylum at Harrisburg, and the Rev. Mr. Herman mourns and refuses to be comforted. It is a very hard case for both. They have shown every disposition to live together in peace. The woman is sane enough to suit her husband, and he is good enough to suit her. If she had owned no property her friends would never have suspected she was insane, and it is likely the reverend gentleman would have married her just the same, for love and good looks. It is not likely that the affair is over yet.—Advertiser.

"THERE IS MANY A sceptical thought in a Christian's mind which he would be unwilling to utter, for he would not be desirous that his friends should know how much he is perplexed on the subject, and he would not think it right to expose the faith of others to the shock which would be felt if they knew what was passing through his mind. 'Oh! the temptations,' said Mr. Payson,' which have harrassed me for the last three months! I have met nothing like them in books. I dare not mention them to any mortal lest they should trouble him as they have troubled me; but should I become an apostate, and write against religion, it seems to me that I could bring forward objections which would shake the faith of all the Christians in the world. What I marvel at is, that the arch-deceiver has never been permitted to suggest them to some of his scribes, and have them published.' 'My difficulties,' said he, in a letter to a friend, 'increase every year. There is one trial which you cannot know experimentally. It is that of being obliged to preach to others when one doubts of everything, and can scarcely believe there is a God. All the Atheistical, Deistical, and heretical objections which I meet with in books, are childish babblings compared with those which Satan suggests, and which he urges upon the mind with a force that seems irresistible. Yet I am often obliged to write sermons and preach when these objections beat upon me like a whirlwind, and almost distract me.'

"In this respect, as in others, a good man is often in a situation in which the Psalmist was, when, in deep perplexity about the justice of the Divine dealings, he said, 'If I say I will speak thus, behold I should offend the generation of thy children.'—Psalm lxxiii. 15. He is, therefore, silent almost against hope, that his apprehension may not be well-founded, and yet not daring to push his investigations farther himself. He is in this respect like the mariner who fears to examine his ship lest he should find the woodwork of the bottom eaten through, and nothing between him and death."—Rev. Albert Barnes.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

CIRCULATE! Circulate!! Circulate THOSE PETITIONS. Don't feel satisfied when your petition is a yard long, unless you have asked every one to sign it. Get good, influential names.

GET EVERYBODY.

Don't neglect to show the petition to any one, because he is a stockholder in some church, or other exempted property, as many such persons admit the justice of the demand; and those who will not should be made to take the responsibility of refusing to sign it.

Don't delay! We want the petitions returned early.

"ONE OF THE MOST ABLE, high-minded and judicious of the religious press."—Boston Journal.

"The Unitarians never had so good a paper as THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER is now. Mr. Mumford has the true editorial faculty, and makes a capital reading paper."—Springfield Republican.

"The Liberal Christian is right in speaking of Mr. Mumford's 'Brevities' in THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER as 'among the brightest and keenest paragraphing to be found in any paper, secular or religious.' Besides, they are seldom, if ever, discourteous."—Zion's Herald.

"THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER—the Unitarian paper published in this city—shows every week that dulness is not a necessary accompaniment of a people who build mainly on a literature. The vivacity and humor which make THE REGISTER welcome to the 'masses' would have been thought something quite unseemly in the days of Channing and Ware. Its columns are liberally flavored with the best kind of nature, which, always and everywhere, is human nature."—Universalist.

The above are a few of the comments bestowed of late upon

THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER,

whether rightfully or not every man should be his own judge, and in order that all may have an opportunity of forming an honest opinion, the publishers agree to send the paper

to all who will send their addresses to the office, No. 7 Tremont Place, Boston.

This is no trap to get your name on the subscription books, and continue sending the paper whether you wish it or not, but a bona fide offer made in good faith, with the hope that, after six weeks' reading, the persons receiving it will so appreciate its contents that they may become regular subscribers. Try it; it will cost you only three cents for a letter stamp or one cent for a postal card to address us, and we shall pre-pay postage on the paper.

The REGISTER is published at $3 per year by

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also, that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

Form a Liberal League,

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY.

EVERY SATURDAY.

The Atlantic, for 1874, begins its thirty-third volume under the most prosperous auspices. The new publishers will spare no pains to keep it the Leading American Magazine, containing the fresh writings of Longfellow, Lowell, Aldrich, Parton, Whittier, Howells, Warner, Owen, Holmes, Bayard Taylor, Wells, Eggleston, with able criticisms upon current literature, art, and science.

Prudence Palfrey, a delightful novel by T. B. Aldrich, is begun in the January number, and

A Serial Story, by W. D. Howells, will begin in an early number.

Personal Reminiscences, by J. G. Whittier, will cover an eventful period in our history, and Life in the Confederate States, by a Confederate, will be an inside view of recent history.

Charles Dudley Warner's Saunterings in the British Provinces will be continued in subsequent numbers.

Robert Dale Owen's Autobiography, which has attracted so much attention, will be resumed, and chapters of peculiar interest will appear.

Local Taxation in the United States, the article in the first number by David A. Wells, will be followed by others from the same hand, on questions of Finance and Political Economy,

And there is every promise of the ablest and most attractive volume of The Atlantic ever published.

TERMS.—Single or specimen numbers, 35 cents. Yearly subscription, $4. The Atlantic and Every Saturday ($5) sent to one address for $8.

Every Saturday, a Journal of Choice Reading (Established January, 1866).—While retaining the prominent characteristics which have long made Every Saturday a favorite journal for the Fireside and the Railway, the forthcoming series will embrace several fresh and attractive features, among which may be mentioned Original American Stories, of which the first will be a serial, entitled "His Two Wives," a story of married life, by Mary Clemmer Ames, and a new Editorial Department devoted to the discussion of home literary, social, and scientific topics.

Under its new management Every Saturday will continue to lay before its readers each week the cream of the foreign weekly and monthly periodicals, giving in a compact and elegant form a larger amount and a greater variety of choice reading matter than is obtainable in any other publication of the same price.

The plan of Every Saturday embraces Serial Tales, Short Stories, Critical and Descriptive Essays, Sketches of Travel and Adventure, Poems, Biographical Papers, Papers on Popular Science, Literary Information; in fine, whatever contributes to produce a Weekly acceptable and attractive to all classes of intelligent American readers.

TERMS.—Weekly Parts, 10 cents; Monthly Parts, 50 cents; Yearly Subscription, $5.

N.B.—The Atlantic Monthly and Every Saturday sent to one address for $8.

$5 TO $20 PER DAY easily made by any one. We want men, women, boys, and girls all over the country to sell our fine Steel Engravings, Chromos, Crayon Drawings, Illuminations, Photographs, etc., etc. We now publish the finest assortment ever placed before the public, and our prices are marked down so low as to defy all competition. No one subscribes for a premium-giving paper in order to get a picture, after seeing our pictures and learning our prices. We have many old agents at work for us, who have made canvassing for books, papers, etc., their business for years, and they all report that they can make much more money at work for us than at anything else. Our prices are so low that all can afford to purchase, and therefore the pictures sell at sight at almost every house. New beginners do as well as agents who have had large experience, for our beautiful subjects and low prices are appreciated by all. To make large sales everywhere all an agent has to do is to show the pictures from house to house. Don't look for work elsewhere until you have seen what great inducements we offer you to make money. We have not space to explain all here, but send us your address and we will send full particulars, free, by mail. Don't delay if you want profitable work for your leisure hours, or for your whole time. Now is the favorable time to engage in this business. Our pictures are the finest and most pleasing in this country, and are endorsed by all the leading papers, including the New York Herald. Those who cannot give the business their entire attention can work up their own localities, and make a handsome sum without ever being away from home over night. Let all who want pleasant, profitable employment, without risking capital, send us their addresses at once, and learn all about the business for themselves. Address

VOLUME 5. BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1874. WHOLE NO. 217.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

BOSTON, Sept. 1, 1873.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GEORGE RIPLEY, who was President of the romantic old "Brook Farm Community" in this neighborhood, is now President of the New York Tribune Association.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH was presented by some friends with a cane, before he sailed from New York. He has gone home to "raise cane" among the English Conservatives.

JOAQUIN MILLER has got a new rôle. He is writing prose for The Independent. There is something intensely human in this man's loves and sympathies, albeit he is a little exaggerative and eccentric.

THE PARK STREET CHURCH, in this city (Rev. Mr. Murray's), has just taken up a collection of over three thousand dollars for the "heathen." If this is to make "the civilized heathen" more civilized, it is well; but if it is meant for the "saving of souls," we respectfully suggest that it be used nearer home.

IT SEEMS that some of the members of the English parliament condescend to kiss the babies of their constituents, as one of the methods of conducting a successful campaign. An M.P. says: "I attribute the fact of my having had measles three times to my having had to kiss so many babies in my canvass."

DUKE ALEXIS, of Russia, can, in Yankee phrase, be said at least to "know beans." He has just written a book on his recent travels in America, in which he speaks highly of our "institution" of baked pork and beans. He says he found it a "very palatable dish," and thinks it would "bear transplanting to Russia." The duke is welcome to all the pork, but we beg him not to bereave us wholly of beans.

OWING TO improvements which have been made in the Immigrant Service, as to increased space, better ventilation, more light, greater abundance of wholesome food and water, a superior morale of officers and crew, on board immigrant vessels, the mortality among steerage passengers has been reduced five per cent. within the last five years. This is good news, and is progress right in the line of the true civilization.

DR. O. A. BROWNSON (Catholic), in his Review for January, expresses a very poor opinion of the Evangelical Alliance. He says its Protestantism is "neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, nor yet good red-herring. It has no principle of its own, but borrows infidel principles when it would fight against the Church, and Church principles when it would fight against infidelity." Dr. Brownson always did have the habit of using very vigorous English.

"THE PEOPLE," in various communications to the Boston Journal, are discussing the "cost of living." "A. E. M." recommends oatmeal as very nutritious and very cheap—good for making "bone and muscle," which is just what our bodies mostly depend upon. He says (or is it she?) that he can get a good breakfast, with oatmeal, for two cents! Here is a way in which all poor persons may at once a-meal-iorate their condition.

THE FIRST plank in the platform of the National Grangers' Association reads as follows: "First—United by the strong and faithful tie of agriculture, we mutually resolve to labor for the good of our order, our country, and mankind." In endeavoring to advance their cause, they also pledge themselves to labor "to develop a better and higher manhood and womanhood among ourselves." All this is very good; and we only hope that the Grangers will stick to their text, and not turn out to be another political party, cherishing chiefly political ambitions.

A MEETING was held in Wesleyan Hall, in this city, last Friday morning, to take into consideration the raising a suitable "memorial" to Prof. Agassiz. Robert C. Winthrop presided, and, among others, O. W. Holmes and R. W. Emerson made addresses. It was decided that the most suitable "memorial" which could be raised to the eminent deceased would be a complete endowment of the great Museum, at Cambridge, which he founded; and for this purpose the sum of three hundred thousand dollars was proposed. Sixty-five thousand of this, it was said, had already been pledged; and a committee was appointed to secure the balance.

WHILE APPLETON CHAPEL, connected with Harvard University, was undergoing repairs, the college morning prayers were omitted for the period of five months. Strange to say, the students did not fall into moral anarchy in consequence of not being compelled to attend prayers! President Eliot, in his last Annual Report, says of this omission: "It had no ill effects whatever on college order. There was no increased irregularity of attendance at morning recitations, no unusual number of absences; the professors and other teachers living beyond the sound of the prayer-bell would not have known, from any effect upon their work with the students, that morning prayers had been omitted." It is astonishing to find how respectable human nature is, when we make up our minds to treat it respectfully.

MRS. ZINA FAY PIERCE spoke at the State House, one day last week, before a committee of the Legislature, in opposition to Woman Suffrage. A friend who was present tells us that she was vigorously hissed by the audience. We are very sorry to hear it. For ourself, we are decidedly in favor of women being admitted to the same political privileges with men, but it would be the essence of bigotry in us to hinder in any way the freest expression of opinion on the part of those who are opposed to this. The political rights of women are sure to be accorded to them at last, but their abilities and disabilities must be submitted to the frankest and most thorough discussion, and everything which can be said on both sides of this question must be allowed to be said. Mrs. Pierce is both honest and able, and, though she may be very wrong in her views on this subject, she should be encouraged in the fullest expression of them.

WE RECENTLY paid a visit to Josiah Warren, of Charlestown. He is the man whom John Stuart Mill, in his Autobiography, speaks of as "a remarkable American." He is, indeed, a remarkable man. He is on his death-bed, but his eye is as bright and his mind as clear as ever. He says it is a grand time to be living; the hour is full of good omens for the future. His face fairly shines with spiritual illumination, and he laughs aloud, when he speaks of the glorious things that wait on the advancing steps of man in the "true civilization" of which he has written and spoken so much. He is seventy-six years old, and says it is time for him to die; but he has no fear of death, and feels no reluctance even to the great event. He leaves behind him a long life faithfully spent for the good of man, and, though he is an "infidel" according to the standard of the Church, he is a noble hero and a grand old man in the eyes of all who know him.

Religion---and A Religion.

A SERMON IN LYRIC HALL, NEW YORK, OCTOBER 19, 1873.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

We have lately had an unusual quantity of talk about religion. Between the Evangelical Alliance and the Free Religious Association the word has become very familiar; more familiar perhaps than intelligible. At the close of the last discussion, a gentleman, who had taken part in it with as much effect as any, said: "I am sick of the subject; I am sick of the word; the very mention of religion is nauseating; if any one should ask me what religion was, I should reply: It is the universal nuisance."

He said this, not in a mood of momentary and incidental fatigue, but from solid and abiding persuasion. He would have said so before the Evangelical Alliance met as feelingly as after the Free Religious Convention closed.

What did he mean? Something more than that he was sick of theology; something more than that he was tired and disgusted with the endless discussion of external and trifling questions; something more than that his soul revolted from the substitution of unreal things for real. He meant that everything which bore the name of religion, everything which was associated with it, everything it implicated and suggested, was obnoxious,—the Sundays it wasted or abused, the idle edifices that poor people were taxed to maintain, Bibles that were worshipped and consequently not read, priests who encouraged the disastrous superstition respecting a gulf betwixt human and divine things which they and they alone had the power to bridge, preachers who carefully avoided all subjects of practical concern to their fellow-men, ordinances which did not ordain, sacraments which did not consecrate, communion suppers where none communed, baptisms which cleansed none, a vast expenditure of mental power and feeling to no special ends, a deliberate, purposed, and successful switching off of moral energies from the track of human welfare and progress on a little side track which ended in a vacant field, a melancholy waste of precious energies which the world daily requires, and consequent impoverishment of the moral resources of mankind. The critic meant all this, and perhaps more. He meant all that such uncompromising words as he used could mean. But did he mean by religion the intercourse of weak minds with strong, of dim minds with enlightened, of dying minds with living? Did he mean frank and fair relations between man and man? Did he mean just, kindly, warm, helpful sympathies? Did he mean disinterestedness, devotion to social welfare, consecration to the general good? Did he mean personal character, social order and improvement, public spirit, aspiration after better human states? I am sure he did not; for he is one who has done good service in the cause of these very interests, and holds in highest esteem those who postpone selfish desires to humane principles.

Let us, then, dwell on this subject awhile, and try to understand what religion is, and what it is not. Two or three definitions deserve a word of comment. Mr. Abbot, one of our keenest and sincerest thinkers, describes religion as "man's effort to perfect himself." The defect of the definition to my mind is that it does not carry its full meaning with it to unthoughtful minds. It needs explanation, if not defence. To say the least, it needs meditation in order to reach its depths. On first reading, it sounds thin, meagre, and cold. It makes us think of people as working themselves up, in a painful way, to unnatural attainments. The suggestion of effort is unpleasant. The word "perfection" is discouraging. The idea of making effort after perfection calls up the recollection of the young hero who climbed a freezing mountain-peak, shouting "Excelsior," and perished at last in the snow. Few people really do make efforts after perfection; few can; few feel impelled to; few wish they might feel impelled to. If the pursuit of perfection is to take them away from their warm human associations, they do not want it. It will be time enough for perfection when they reach a sublimated state of existence; here they prefer to be imperfect with the rest of their kind. Affection, sympathy, fellowship, in joy and sorrow and weakness, is mortality's privilege, not mortality's curse, and if religion demands the sacrifice of that, they will forego religion. Mr. Abbot's conception of religion may be severely philosophical, but it strikes the ordinary mind as bleak and desolating.

Samuel Johnson partially escapes this danger by defining religion as "the natural attraction of mind as finite to mind as infinite." The word "attraction" has a pleasing sound—it is far more genial than the word "effort." But the terms "finite" and "infinite" are abstract and frigid. What is meant by the attraction of finite mind to infinite? Is there any such attraction? Who feels it? How shall one put himself in the way of feeling it? Is it not something like an attraction of the green earth, not to a glowing, life-giving sun, but to the primal, unorbed, uncreated light, to a kind of universal fire-mist rolling and boiling, but unorganized? What is infinite mind? Where is it? Does it correspond with anything we know of as mind? The simple soul may well be discouraged in its effort to obtain help from such a definition.

There is a third description of religion which, meaning substantially the same thing, comes much nearer the mark of intelligibleness and practical utility. Religion, let us say, is the close relation of the separate part to its whole. To its whole, not to some abstract and incomprehensible whole, but to the particular aggregate which stands to it for the whole, be it larger or be it smaller. Take this conception to pieces and dwell on it.

There are those still, the majority it would seem, who by "the whole" understand the infinite whole, boundless, abstract, eternal,—what we call, in other words, God, the absolute, a whole, unorganized as yet in any form, invisible in any shape. To become related to this whole is the aim of the religious mind, and to establish such relation is the religious mind's study. To do this is the office of meditation and prayer, of solitary communion and discipline. The attempt to effect it has created the class of ascetics who mortified the flesh by fasting and penance, withdrew from society, forsook pleasure, gain, position, changed themselves so far as they could into bodiless spirits, went into trances, cultivated the habit of seeing visions and dreaming dreams and losing for considerable periods their consciousness of earthly things. The class of mystics owes its existence to this conception of the whole with which the individual is to be joined; people who spend their lives in musing and contemplation, loving seclusion and silence; harmless and pure beings, serene and holy, often of deep insight, always of sweet, calm dispositions, free from passion, unoccupied by care, undisturbed by trouble, submissive and tranquil under all circumstances. They have never been numerous; they never can be numerous in the nature of things, and certainly it is not desirable that they should be. The notion of a relation between a man or a woman and an impalpable abstraction can lead to nothing but fancifulness and uselessness. To the scientific man of cultivated mind, the whole is the cosmos, the material universe in its full extent of glory, with earths, moons, suns, constellations, forming a vast organism, made uniform and harmonious by law; the embodied power, wisdom, and goodness of the Supreme Being. With this whole he feels himself connected; to it he belongs; in it he adores; its glory imparts itself to his mind; its order solemnizes his heart. As a member of so vast a system, he cannot but have exalted aims, a consciousness of worth, a sense of responsibleness for the part he is set to enact, of accountability for faculties bestowed and gifts imparted. His acknowledged relationship to this divine system is his religion, and a very grand religion it is. But such a conception of the cosmos is for spacious and cultured minds. The religion is for the few.

Others will conceive the universe as a human whole, palpable and distinct. They call it humanity, the race, the sum of living men, without distinction of country or clime. The people who hold this idea —they are few, because intellect and imagination are required for it—make pure philanthropy, love of man as man, self-sacrifice, devotion to general principles of justice or beneficence, their religion. These are the connecting links between them and the vast entity which stands for the sum of power, wisdom, and goodness. These persons have a very real religion, though they believe in nothing outside of man or above him, and in nothing beyond terrestrial existence; though they have no conscious God, and no individual immortality, they recognize their partnership in, and their close affiliation with, a whole, outside of themselves, to which they owe service and from which they derive sustenance.

But this conception of the whole is far too large for the ordinary mind, which is simply bewildered by a notion so complex and vague, and must fall back within narrower boundaries. To many, therefore, the country they live in and the nation they belong to constitute the whole. They cannot see beyond State lines. Their God is a national deity. Their country is their idol. Her dignity, her rank, her honor, they have chiefly at heart. They are patriots, and patriotism is their religion. Their country they are always ready to serve with their wealth, their intellect, their influence. For their country they are willing to suffer, if need be to die. They will offer up their children on its altar, as resolutely as Abraham offered Isaac to his Lord. At her call they are ready to leave friends and home. Their bosoms swell with pride when they think of her; their capacity of praise is exhausted in extolling her greatness; to be enrolled in her annals and remembered among her benefactors is all the immortality they desire. This was the religion of the ancient Hebrew; this was the religion of the old Roman. A true religion it was, too, accompanied by the grandest virtues and by the sweetest graces, resulting in characters that touched the sublime in their elevation, and illustrated by careers so glorious as to make the blood burn in our veins only to read of at the distance of a thousand years. The names of high patriots deserve to be written in the roll of saints. They are saints in the essential quality of resignation to a weal and will larger than their own; they are saints in devotion of private interests to public ends; not saints of the lean, transparent, and ghostly kind, but saints strong and vascular, saints who have blood in their veins to shed. There is more saintliness in shedding blood, as thousands did in our civil war, than in accepting the blood of another shed for them, as the millions of Christendom do now.

Still, this conception of the whole, too, is larger than ordinary minds can hold. The religion of patriotism is too vast. They cannot see so far even as to State lines. He who is no nearer to them than a countryman is very remote indeed, very shadowy and uninteresting. They do not care for him, are not concerned for him. They wish well to their country, prefer that it should prosper rather than decline, but it never occurs to them to deny themselves a pleasure, or forego an advantage, or relinquish a luxury for her sake. Their children shall not pass through the fire for her, nor shall a hair of their head be injured. Yet these, too, have their whole with which they keep up a close connection. Their kindred represent to them the absolute; their family stands for perfection. For one of their own blood they will do anything in their power; will deny themselves comforts, conveniences, necessities; it is their ambition to sustain the family name; to ennoble it if they may. Not the most exalted ambition certainly, but not necessarily an ignoble one. It is not selfish; it is not productive of vice, sensuality, or indolence; it does not encourage avarice, or base pride, or contempt. Limited it is; but it is not, of course, narrow; for the pride of blood has made noble creatures of a type that has been heartily and generally admired. In the world of society the model man or woman is the man or woman whom the pride of a generous ancestry elates; who for the sake of worthy fathers will tell no lie, will do no mean thing, will lend his name to no vile transaction, will keep no disgraceful associates. Not seldom the sense of kindred with honorable lines does more than this. It has been known to animate its possessor to exploits of positive chivalry, commit him to causes that required serious sacrifices, and forced him to rank himself with heroes. Often and often have men and women told me what they should have done or become had not the memory of father or mother, deceased, watched over them and preserved them. That memory was an inspiration from the highest heaven they knew. Some recollected word of admonition, precept, or prayer, was more potent than any text in Bible, Old or New. Some haunting smile or frown was more persuasive or intimidating than any holy legends of the wrath or the graciousness of God.

Yet even this conception of the whole is larger than many minds can grasp. How many there must be who never think of forefathers and mothers, who cannot remember their names, and never care to know their characters, whose mental horizon reaches back no further than their own youth, and whose range of sympathy embraces only those immediately about them; and yet in these they do live and move and have their very being. Their home is to them the abode of all the sanctity and all the peace they know. Husband and wife—brother and sister—son and daughter—father and mother—make for them a very substantial outward world, quite as large and rich as their imagination can call up and their heart can fill. It engages all their affection, tries all their constancy, exhausts their whole sense of responsibility. The kindness there awakens their gratitude. The joy keeps them glad. The sorrow chastens. The birth of children reminds them of the mystery of existence. Their death suggests thoughts of the eternal world. That the dear ones at home may have all they desire—comfort, advantage, education, elegance, culture, accomplishment—the man works hard all day, saves, denies himself many an indulgence. That they may have an honorable position and name, he keeps himself honest. That they may be happy, he keeps himself cheerful — conceals anxious or melancholy thoughts, puts away the distraction of care, and gives himself up to the merry entertainments of the household. Such a man is religious in a very true sense. He feels the relation between himself and a whole, of which he is a part. He is devout—that is, devoted. He is self-forgetting—that is, saintly. It may not be the religion of a large mind, but all have not large minds. It may not be the religion of a big heart, but big hearts are few. It may not be the religion of a lofty soul, but how common are lofty souls? The conditions of religion are satisfied when a world is given, a world outside of oneself, yet of which one feels himself a constituent part, not as lord and master, but as lover and servant. And if the world is as large as he can comprehend, as large as he can fill, large enough to engage his heart, and employ his conscience, and stimulate his ambition, and quicken his better resolutions, it does for him all that a greater world will do for a greater person—all that country does for the patriot—all that humanity does for the reformer or the philanthropist—all that the imagined realities of the spiritual world will do for the devotee and saint. The whole he lives in and for is his universe, with all of divinity and all of heaven he knows.

Very partial and selfish this religion seems to one who regards it from the outside. But what religion does not? The patriot, in loving his own country best, does no justice, and may do grave injustice, to other lands. The philanthropist, loving humanity supremely, dislikes, and even hates and scorns, those who love it less. The saint is by no means disinterested in his longings for heaven. Can any selfishness exceed that of the religious devotee who makes the salvation of his private soul the end of all his living—who felicitates himself on his share in the atoning blood of the Redeemer, who hugs his Savior with a passion earnest in proportion to his anxiety to escape from hell, and cherishes his connection with the Church because in the Church he feels safe? The longing for immortal felicity is the essence of selfishness. Religion demands that one shall forget himself in the whole he is a part of; and if one can do that in family, or friend, or trade, it is as well for him as if he did it in the race or in the eternal.

For this, I repeat, is the substance of religion, the vital relation of the part to the whole. Can anything be simpler? Can anything be more rational? Doctrine has nothing to do with it. Suppose a father of a family unable to love his wife and children because he cannot satisfy himself respecting the Darwinian hypothesis! Fancy a patriot unable to serve his country because he cannot come to a conclusion about the nebula theory, or the pre-historic origin of his countrymen! Imagine a philanthropist unable to love his kind because he cannot be certain of the genuineness of the story of the Garden of Eden! It were as reasonable as to say that to love justice, equity, purity, one must settle in his mind whether or no the Supreme Mind is simple or threefold. Religion has nothing to do with these things. Religion is merely the vital relation of the part to the whole, be the whole larger or smaller.

Now, however much or little of genuine religion there may be in the world, there are plenty of religions; no less than eight or ten great world religions, race religions, embracing from many hundred thousands to many millions of people. The Persians, Hindus, Arabs, Egyptians, Hebrews, Chinese, Greeks, Romans, Northmen, Southmen, Islanders, all and each have their special religion, constructed according to their genius, simple or complicated, bald or rich, ugly or handsome, hideous or attractive, according to circumstances. All these religions have precisely the same object; namely, to bring the separate parts into close relations with the great whole—as Mr. Johnson would say, to make the finite mind feel its attraction to the infinite mind; as common language says, to bring man into communion with God; all aim at this.

And all aim at this in substantially the same way. All use the same kind of apparatus, and work it by the same means; all have a theology or account of the great whole; all have priests and preachers, sacrifices, litanies, modes of intercession; all have redeemers, martyrs, saints; all have temples, altars, holy places, holy days; all have miracles, relics, wonder-working shrines, healing fountains of water; all have sacred services of prayer, chanting, prophesying; all have rites of communion, baptism, confession, absolution, penance; all have methods of atonement for sin. So nearly alike are these mechanical devices for joining the part to the whole that it looks as if they had been borrowed one from another, as very probably they were.

That there are certain advantages in these separate religions cannot be denied. They allow each tribe of men, according to its own genius, and after its own fashion, to get at the absolute. They make it possible for each to "realize," as we say, divine things, to bring impalpable objects near, and make unseen things visible. They help the imagination, aid the fancy, strengthen associations; they are ladders set up between earth and heaven. If people cannot consecrate every day, their religion teaches them to consecrate one day in seven. They cannot revere or respect mankind; and their religion teaches them to pay divine honors to a single person. They cannot acknowledge the dignity of the human mind; their religion teaches them to ascribe inspiration to one product of it, calling it Bible. They cannot attach sacredness to all places and buildings; their religion teaches them to consecrate a special spot, to call a piece of land holy ground, a particular edifice the house of God. In a word, the religion makes what was abstract concrete; domesticates divine things as it were; presents to eyes and ears and even fingers, what otherwise would be misty and evanescent. No doubt, in multitudes of cases, people learn all they know about religion from their special religion, gain all their ideas of divine things from the symbols and forms which their religion presents to them. But there are serious drawbacks, which it becomes us patiently so consider:—

1. The special religion, whatever its name, whether it be called Hebrew, Mohammedan, or Christian, substitutes an unreal whole for a real one. The whole, the universe, the realm of the absolute and eternal, which should be a substantial world, a world of thought, feeling, activity, being, a world of persons, interests, warm practical concerns, becomes through the agency of the special religion a world of symbols, notions, conceptions, mental forms,—not a living world at all, but a shadowy, speculative world, an account of a world, a theory of a world, a theology instead of a God, a Christology instead of a Christ, an anthropology instead of a man, a doctrine of hell instead of a hell, a doctrine of heaven instead of heaven. The relation effected or sought is not a relation between the part and the whole, but between the part and some scheme, fiction, or picture of a whole. The special religion makes a point of knitting the individual, not to divine things, but to a church, a creed, a confession, which stands for divine things. Its point is to make the individual a believer in a doctrine—a member of a sect. That done, the rest is left to be taken for granted. In a word, the real concern, the union of the part to the whole, is omitted altogether, and an illusion is put in its place. The effort of every religion, made through its ministers, is to make converts to its doctrine, and members of its organization. That done, all is done. Whether or no that effects any further union with the world of thought, feeling, purpose, will, sympathy, in which all men and women, though they know it not, live and move and have their being, is quite another matter.

I am not making nice distinctions; I am not drawing superfine lines of difference; I am stating a broad and very obvious truth, which a very little reflection and observation will bring home to any candid mind. To believe in the divine character of a person who lived two thousand years ago is certainly not the same thing as grappling closely a living divine character; to be persuaded that a special book is inspired is not the same thing as drawing inspiration from the resources of illuminated mind; to hold that a certain church is providentially established is not the same thing as being a live member of a live brotherhood. Shadow is put in the place of substance, and the essential aim of religion is defeated.

2. After saying this, it is hardly necessary to say that the special religion, however it be called, falls into the temptation to idolatry. It worships the image instead of the deity it represents. The machinery receives the honors that are due only to the work it should perform. Each special religion becomes a system of tool worship. The supper of communion becomes a holy and adorable sacrament. The simple rite of baptism becomes a miracle-working charm. The meeting-house becomes a shekinah which a touch may desecrate; the Bible a magical volume, a leaf whereof will cure disease, a text whereof will determine fortune and announce destiny. The very language of the creed becomes inviolable, so that not to hold it just as it is written is to incur damnation. The purest religion on earth is justly chargeable with this kind of idolatry. The purest sect in the purest religion is more or less open to the accusation. It seems to be unavoidable.

And for the reason that—

3. The special religion is always identified with religion itself. The religion is reckoned to be religion. Each special faith assumes to be the only true faith; every other is false, mischievous, misleading. Hence the scorn and hate with which the members of the great world religions look at one another. Hence the names "infidel," "miscreant," pagan," which are so conspicuous in religious speech. Hence the interminable and furious wars that the religions wage for extension, conquest, and supremacy. Hence the military organizations called missionary societies, costly, wasteful, and useless, which the most advanced religions keep in the field. Hence the deadly animosities which do more than any wars to make impossible the fraternity of mankind, to make impossible religion, which is that fraternity, on the small scale and the large. If this fatal illusion which confounds religion with a religion could be dispelled, the first movement towards a grand inauguration of peace and good-will would be made. The deadliest of all hates would be abolished. The Emperor of Austria entertains the King of Italy, though both have met on bloody fields of battle, and one at least has bitter memories to forget. When will the Pope of the Latin Church and the Patriarch of the Greek Church in like manner embrace? When will the Archbishop of Canterbury shake hands with Cardinal Antonelli? When will Dr. Hall and Dr. Bellows be cordial guests in the same household of faith? When will Rabbi Adler of Temple Immanuel be in fast league with Dr. McCosh? The antipathies of religions are the last to disappear. The oldest are still fresh, and new ones are engendered yearly. Religion means brotherhood; religions mean division.

4. Another serious detriment arises from the practice of instituting, cherishing, and perpetuating separate religions, a detriment intimately connected with the causes of mischief already mentioned. It is this: The special religion, whatever it be, draws so much attention to itself that the practical concerns which religion deals with are left out of view. The actual relations of men to the world they live in are neglected, sometimes so utterly as to be denied all interest in religion's end and aim. This is even insulted—thrust out of doors—called by disgusting and nauseating names—as "filthy rags." I doubt if there be a sect of religionists in the world which will frankly admit that justice, honesty, fair-dealing between man and man, fellowship in sorrow, joy, sin, virtue, kindness, mutual sympathy and helpfulness, coördination of interests, homely recognition of rights and duties, domestic fidelity and love, constitute religion, and that everything beside is merely an aid to this. All religions inculcate charity, but as a secondary and incidental thing. All inculcate truth, justice, goodness, but as consequences, not as ends. All talk of a regenerated earth, but as a far-off anticipation to be looked for as the result of a right belief in the "system." But not one identifies religion with social welfare on a limited or an unlimited scale. They are all in fact shocked by the suggestion that social welfare is religion.

What religion can show a perfect or anything like a perfect society? What religion can show a society free from horrible evils? What religion is ashamed because it cannot? Does Romanism apologize for the condition of modern Europe, which for a thousand years it had all but completely under its control? Does the Greek Church apologize for the mental and moral degradation of its millions of subjects? Does the English Church blush for the crime and misery of London? Does Protestantism in New York—rich, popular, influential—hang its head with shame at the financial frauds, the mercantile dishonesties, the nameless social abominations in which its members in high standing are implicated? These things are quietly charged to the innate depravity of human nature, and the sects call for more money and more power that they may be enabled to work harder the machinery of regeneration. The reformers who have at heart the improvement of social well-being in special particulars invariably take up their position outside the sects; the philanthropists detach their philanthropy from church membership; and men who, like George Holyoake and Charles Bradlaugh in England, and men I need not name at home, make social well-being the object of their lives, finding that they cannot work inside the religious organizations at all, consider them their foe and wage against them unrelenting war. This evil may be traced in large measure, if not wholly, to the substitution of a religion for religion. For religion, rationally understood, begins with these very facts which the special religions neglect.

From all that has been said it must be clear enough that I regard the special religion as a hindrance rather than a help to pure religion. And religion is so closely identified with some special religion, and is made answerable for its mistakes so continually, that the word itself becomes misleading and obnoxious. It is not surprising that some are so weary of the sound of it that they can hardly hear it spoken with patience. But it is too good a word to lose; it is quite worth saving. It has a spell in it which is not yet broken, and will not be for generations yet to come. It carries with it associations it would be a pity not to preserve. Religion is a great word; as yet there is no other that will do its work in the language. The word science is not its equivalent. We must try to give it new significance. It already means much that is of prime importance, and that no other term expresses so well. And this is by no means to be permitted to elude us. Religion may be, as a great Roman writer called it, an "execrable superstition;" it may be, as our modern writer called it, "the universal nuisance." Religion, as interpreted by churches and sects, may be a hindrance to the progress of society. But no religion at all is so bad that we are inclined to think the poorest of religions a boon to mankind. For no religion at all is unqualified, unmitigated selfishness, the denial that the individual has any vital relation with any whole, large or small; the assumption that the individual is supreme, has a right to everything he can absorb, is answerable to none, is amenable to no tribunal, is subject to no law, is responsible for no service. Any whole, any fiction of a whole, any dream or illusion of a whole, which, by taking the individual even in thought or fancy out of himself, will make him imagine himself part of a system, and will interest him in that system's completeness, is an advantage as giving a wide horizon view, even if the person never journeys beyond his own farm. Anything to break up selfishness! Far better a mean religion than none. But how much better than either is a religion that means honest relations of sympathy and help!

If I understand the purpose of what is called "Free Religion,"—and who should understand it if I do not?—it is by emancipating religion from its association with religions, to bring the whole matter down, or rather to lift the whole matter up, to the level of honest fact—to beget a real relation with a real world—to ground religion in knowledge and experience. It would make men indifferent to the songs of angels, and set them to listening to the still, sad music of humanity.

A NATIONAL CONVENTION.

THOSE WHO INTEND TO IMPROVE THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES—THE GATHERING IN LIBRARY HALL YESTERDAY—ORGANIZATION OF THE CONVENTION—THE OPENING ADDRESS AND OTHER SPEECHES—A REPORT OF THE PROCEEDINGS AFTERNOON AND EVENING.

The National Convention to agitate the movement for a Religious Amendment to the Constitution met yesterday in Library Hall. Delegates were present from many parts of the United States, though in small numbers, but the hall was at both sessions filled to its utmost capacity, principally by local adherents to the idea. The Convention promises to be the most active that has yet been held on the subject, as the attendance comprises several men of more than average ability, who direct the movements with precision and effect. The presence of outside delegates, however, is not so large as was expected, n any letters of regret having been received from persons confidently expected to be present. It is thought that more people from abroad will be on hand to-day, but at all events the public interest in the proceedings has already secured the success of the Convention.

THE ORGANIZATION AND OPENING.

Punctuality was not a ruling feature of the sessions yesterday. The opening was nearly an hour behind time, it being close upon three o'clock before the leaders of the movement appeared upon the platform. As soon as the assemblage had come to order, Hon. Felix R. Brunot stepped forward and announced that as President of the National Association it was his duty to declare the Convention assembled. He would nominate Rev. J. R. W. Sloane as Temporary Chairman. This gentleman at once advanced and read the call under which the delegates had met together. This having been done, prayer was offered by Dr. Hodge. The Chairman then stated that it was proper to say that the meeting was a convention of delegates, and not a mass meeting. To arrange for the transaction of business, the following committees had been appointed, the members of which were requested to assemble in the wings:—

PRELIMINARY COMMITTEES APPOINTED.

Enrollment Committee—Rev. H. H. George, Rev. J. W. Bain, Rev. D. Benner, D. Chestnut, Esq., Rev. D. Gregg, Rev. J. K. Ormand, Walter Miller, Esq., Rev. Nevin Woodside, and Rev. H. Miller, D.D.

Committee on Permanent Organization—Rev. M. Keiffer, D.D., Thos. H. Robb, Jr., A. M. Brown, Rev. J. L. McCartney, Rev. J. B. Johnson, D.D., Rev. A. M. Milligan, Rev. H. W. Spaulding, S. A. Sterrett, M.D., Rev. D. B. Miller, Rev. N. J. Reid, Rev. D. B. Wilson, and Rev. W. H. French.

The Committee collected as requested, and while arranging their business the meeting was addressed by Rev. D. T. Stevenson, of Philadelphia, who spoke on the object of the movement. He said that it devolved upon him to preface the deliberations with an address on "The Ends we Seek." It was not, as had been said against the movement, designed to unite Church and State. This had been denied over and over again, and would be now. Their principle was that the State ask God of itself. The gentleman then went on to say that the general tendency of the times was toward infidelity among the people, and secularism in public acts. The present movement was to control this tendency. It was necessary to go to the foundation of all the laws, and by recognizing the Christian religion in the great charter of the republic, future legislation and public action must be on such a basis. The address was listened to with much attention, and was heartily applauded.

THE PERMANENT ORGANIZATION.

The Committee on Permanent Organization reported as follows:—

President—Felix R. Brunot.

Vice-Presidents—Rev. D. Bonner, New York; Rev. Jonathan Edwards, Illinois; Prof. A. A. Hodge, Pennsylvania; Rev. Wm. Johnston, Indiana; Rev. E. R. Craven, New Jersey; Rev. J. B. Johnson, D.D., Ohio; T. H. Baird Patterson, Pennsylvania; Rev. Randall Ross, Missouri; Rev. M. Keiffer, Pennsylvania; Rev. R. A. McAyeal, Iowa; Rev. R. B. Cannon, Wisconsin; Joseph Bowers, Esq., Florida.

Secretaries—D. K. Kerr, W. S. Owens, and reporters for the press.

Hon. Felix R. Brunot thereupon took the chair, and spoke as follows:—

OPENING ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT.

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONVENTION: As I cast my thoughts back over the short period of time which has elapsed since the organization of the National Association for the Religious Amendment of the Constitution, recalling the events of its life, and as I scan the long list of the names of distinguished men who have signed the call for the Convention, I feel that our cause has made the progress of twenty years in five. And as, with this conviction, I stand in the presence of this grand assemblage of earnest men, there is one thought which, above all others, fills my soul and first of all demands expression. It is that of gratitude to Almighty God for that He has so abundantly blessed the efforts of our Association. To Him be the glory! To us, the duty to go forward with the work He has given us to do, and upon which He smiles. Let us address ourselves to the duty, so far as we may, in a spirit and manner worthy of our cause.

The publications of the National Association and the call which has been read, clearly set forth the objects of its organization. This Convention, constituted of delegates only appointed by branches of the Association and other friendly bodies from many and distant parts of our country, has assembled to promote those objects.

We are to do this by advancing such arguments in favor of our position as may tend to convince others; by confuting the arguments which have been advanced in opposition, by correcting misunderstandings and misrepresentations, and by devising such measures as may be deemed best to win public opinion to right action, and lead to an Amendment of the Constitution necessary to conform it to the religious convictions of the people, and which we believe to be essential for the preservation of religious and civil liberty.

DECLARATION OF INTENTIONS.

We propose such an Amendment to the Constitution of the United States (or its preamble) as will suitably acknowledge Almighty God as the author of the nation's existence and the ultimate source of its authority, Jesus Christ as its Ruler, and the Bible as the supreme rule of its conduct, and thus indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all Christian laws, institutions, and usages on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land.

The fourth Article of the Constitution declares that "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States," and the first Amendment in the Constitution provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." We have not proposed to change these. We deem them essential, in connection with the Amendment we ask, to the preservation of religious liberty, and with it an effective guard against "a union of Church and State."

No nation ever existed without a religion, and the religion of our nation is Christian morality. Her laws are founded on the principles of Christian morality as contra-distinguished from natural morality—revealed religion as the opposite of natural religion. The written source from which their principles are derived is the Bible. The written laws and common law are in accordance with the religion of the people. They are Christian, and we have no other laws, save the Constitution, the supreme law which stands as the infallible test and rule of construction.

CHRISTIANITY AN ULTIMATE APPEAL.

In Great Britain the Bible is the law which stands behind all other laws. Chitty says, in notes to Vattel: "In cases of doubt it is now an admitted rule amongst all European nations that our common religion, Christianity, pointing out the principles of natural justice, should be equally appealed to and observed by all as an unfailing rule of construction."

It is not so here. In the United States there is no ultimate appeal but the Constitution. The laws must agree with the Constitution, and being continued they have no binding authority in the courts unless they so agree. Our Christian laws, institutions, and usages have no legal basis in the fundamental law of the land.

We propose—not demand—that the Constitution shall be made to conform to the Christian character of the nation. "Let it simply be asked," said Washington, "where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths, which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice?" Let us pursue the thought, and further ask, Where is the security for religious liberty and the rights of conscience, if the Christian idea is abolished from the laws of the land.

God, Religion, and Liberty in the Constitution—or God, Religion, and Liberty eliminated from the laws of the land—are the alternatives presented. Which will the people choose?

Licentiousness and tyranny are the enemies and antipodes of religion. Nor is piety by any means essential to the appreciation of a fact so readily proved from history. Said the great and wise patriot I have quoted: "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports; . . . the mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and cherish them. . . . Reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles."

THE STATE'S RESPONSIBILITY TO GOD.

If the Bible is true, we must believe that the State is a divine institution for the good of man, and that the governments of earth are dependent on the government of heaven for their prosperity. History and prophesy alike testify to God's absolute dominion. "For there is no power but of God." The Bible and history, analogy and reason, and the corroborative testimony of the great writers on national jurisprudence, affirm the moral personality of the State. In its capacity as a personality responsible to God, the State governs under his authority, deprecates his wrath, or invokes his aid, and is answerable to Him for its acts. As private distress brings individual men to feel their dependence, so, also, national calamity humbles the State before its Supreme Ruler.

There are many patriots and Christians who have, as yet, given no thought to the subject in these aspects. If it had fallen to the duty of the people in some dark period of the civil war to form a Constitution and erect the State, these men would have been to the front, and the instrument devised would have been all glowing with God—the acknowledgment of his divine sovereignty, man's dependence upon his power, and invocation for his gracious protection and guidance.

Deny, if you choose, the personality and moral responsibility of the State, and accept the shallow thoughts of those who liken the Constitution to a "sign-board," or to "a town charter," and the State to a "railroad corporation," or to "a counting-house;" be oblivious to every argument by which the friends of the Religious Amendment have proved the paramount importance and wisdom of the measure, there still remains the instinct of fealty to Almighty God, and to the Savior, which, it seems to me, must inevitably draw all Christian minds to its support. Mr. Brunot concluded his address by thanking the Convention for the honor conferred.

MATTERS OF ROUTINE CHARACTER.

On the conclusion of Mr. Brunot's address the list of Vice-Presidents was read, and the gentlemen invited upon the platform.

Letters from Prof. A. H. Seelye, of Amherst College; Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, New York; Wm. H. Green, D.D., LL.D., Princeton College; Solomon Poole, D.D., University of North Carolina; Rev. B. P. Aydelott, D.D., Cincinnati; Gen. James A. Ekin, U.S.A.; R. G. H. McAnees, Fort Wayne, and from Bishop Kerfoot, of this city.

The following were appointed a Committee on Resolutions: Rev. J. P. Tuttle, Hon. T. H. Patterson, Rev. George P. Hays, Rev. Randall Ross, Rev. Geo. Hill, D.D., Rev. J. R. N. Sloane, Rev. T. J. Cooper, D.D., Jas. R. W. Baker, Esq.

ADDRESS OF DR. MCALLISTER.

The announcement was then made that the address of Rev. Dr. Hodge would be omitted for a time, and that Dr. McAllister would speak in his place. That gentleman gave notice of another meeting to be held in the church of Rev. Dr. Howard, on Penn Avenue, in the evening. This being concluded, the gentleman presented testimonies to the religious defect of the Constitution, reading from authorities on the subject gathered from all sources since the Constitution was adopted. He interspersed these extracts with remarks of an energetic character. The list embraced the names of many prominent in the history of the country, lawyers, jurists, and statesmen, as well as divines. Among them Luther Martin (1778), of the Convention that framed the Constitution, Dr. John Rogers (1788), Dr. John M. Mason, Samuel Austin, D. D., President Theodore Dwight, Alex. McLeod, Justice Story, Rev. D. X. Junkin, Prof. J. H. M'Ilvaine, Horace Bushnell, New York Independent (1861), Dr. Henry A. Boardman, Robert J. Breckinridge, and John Martin Pomeroy. His remarks were listened to with great attention, and at the conclusion he was loudly applauded. The Convention then adjourned to meet at seven and a half o'clock.

THE EVENING SESSION.

The Convention opened its evening session with prayer by Rev. Mr. Keefe. More persons were in attendance than at the morning session, the hall being filled to its utmost capacity, while many were compelled to remain outside. The President then introduced Rev. D. R. Kerr, D.D., who spoke upon the subject of national responsibility to God.

THE ADDRESS OF REV. DR. KERR.

The gentleman began by expressing some surprise that among Christian people there should be any diversity of opinion in regard to the importance of some such movement as that in behalf of which the Convention was assembled. He could understand why they who rule God out of their hearts, and would rule Him out of the universe if they could, should be opposed to it, but that they who love God, and rejoice in their own personal allegiance to Him, should be in the opposition was at least remarkable. If a nation were but an aggregation of individuals, as we are required to acknowledge God in all our ways we should be willing to acknowledge Him in our national as in all other relations and duties. He knew the difficulties in many Christian minds. Some denied the alleged defect in the Constitution, others had fears of union of Church and State, and others thought the nation could not be any more really Christian if the name of the Christian God were put in the Constitution a thousand times. These were answered in detail, and on the last the speaker insisted that if the nation was really Christian, if in all its better elements it was an outgrowth of Christianity, why should we not desire to see the great fact emblazoned on the nation's escutcheon?

NATIONS ARE ORGANIC UNITIES.

But the nation is not a mere aggregation of individuals. It is an organic unity, with a moral accountability as close and as binding as any moral obligation resting on the individual man. And it was made so by an ordinance of God as clearly revealed as that which rules in the family or rules in the Church.

The particular form of organization might be left to circumstances or the voice of many, but when formed it comes under the divine ordinance, and is subject to divine authority and law. Nations may not be willing to acknowledge God, but it is His prerogative and power to hold them to their responsibility, and He does. This appeared from declarations of Scripture which were quoted. The principle of national responsibility was further illustrated by the dealings of nations with each other, special reference being made to our late troubles with Spain, in which we did not make our demands for reparation upon the individuals perpetrating the outrage, but upon the nation. On the same principle God deals with all nations.

OUR NATION UNDER SPECIAL OBLIGATION.

It was then shown that of all existing nations ours was under the greatest obligations to acknowledge God. How it was brought into existence, protected and prospered; how, in all the stages of its growth, down to its organization under the present Constitution, it had maintained its distinctively Christian character was considered. The remarkable coincidence of unfaithfulness to God and human rights, at that time, was noticed, and how we had been delivered from slavery through the fiery ordeal of war, and how the grand results had been recovered by Constitutional amendments.

Can any Christian be in doubt on which side he should be in this conflict? We wish no restraint of the rightful liberties of any man. But we would have the God of all men and all consciences acknowledged in his rights. We would have Him as the God of this nation exalted in the land, and acknowledged in the supremacy of his authority and glory of his name.

A PETITION TO CONGRESS INTENDED.

At the conclusion of the address the following Committee was appointed on petition to Congress: Rev. W. C. Williamson, George Lilier, Esq., Rev. J. P. Larchy, William Wills, Esq., and Rev. William McFarland. This Committee was invited to meet at once in one of the ante-rooms.

The President next introduced Rev. R. Audley Browne, D.D., of Newcastle, Pa., who spoke on the relation of the proposed Amendment to the suffrage of the opposing citizens. His address was argumentative and interesting. The following is a synopsis of his remarks:—

REMARKS BY DR. AUDLEY BROWNE.

After congratulating the meeting on the fact that the natural enemies and the natural friends of "God in the Constitution" were fast finding their proper sides, and thus preparing the way for the success of the movement, he said it devolved upon him to answer an objection often urged against the Amendment, that it would preclude all persons from taking the oath to support the Constitution who did not believe the propositions that God is the author of power in government, Jesus Christ governor of nations, and the Bible the supreme law. The opponents of the Amendment asserted that infidels, Jews, and Unitarians would be precluded from naturalization, from practising law in our courts, from being members of our Legislatures and Congress, Governors of our States and Presidents of the United States, and that such men as Wm. Ellery Channing, John Adams, and Thomas Jefferson would be excluded from citizenship and office under the operation of such a clause. These opponents asserted that nothing should be in the Constitution of a religious character, and about which men might have conscientious differences of opinion. Now if that were the case it would be a very brief document, much briefer than it now is, for, directly in the teeth of the religious and conscientious conviction, assertion that any one would be disqualified by the Amendment is a pure assumption, inasmuch as the support of a Constitution is one thing and the belief of its propositions a different thing. Now read the Amendment. That is certainly what this great Christian people believe, but not without exceptions. It is true the people so hold its declaration in the Constitution is important as a foundation to Christian institutions and laws now incorporated and existing among our civil and political institutions, viz.: marriage the Sabbath, the oath, Christian chaplaincies, laws against profanity and blasphemy, and the Bible in our common schools. But that no man under the Amendment, swearing to support the Constitution, would be understood to be subscribing to it as his creed is manifest from that clause of the instrument. Art. 6, 3: "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office of public trust under the United States." Neither friend nor foe of the Amendment, therefore, need imagine its adoption will purge our politics of men godless in their creeds and lives. That can only be accomplished by the eternal vigilance of good men at the polls. (Applause.) The Amendment will do great good, but that is a good it cannot do. They who think so have underestimated the persistence and tenacity of the typical representative American office-seeker. This Amendment will not choke him off. Men who oppose it now, or who have not yet discovered whether they are for Christ or not, once the Amendment is adopted will declare they always thought it was a good thing, and will be found scrambling with the mother of Zebedee's children to obtain the right and left-hand positions in the kingdom. (Laughter and applause.) The speaker then showed how both Jefferson and Adams deplored the lack of the recognition of God and Christianity, and thought their writings were better able to speak for them than those who now, self-appointed, attempt to do so.

CLOSING WORDS BY PROF. BLANCHARD.

Upon the conclusion of the address of Rev. Mr. Browne, Prof. C. A. Blanchard was introduced and spoke on the "Conflict of Law." His address was quite objective in character, and perhaps for that reason drew a great deal of applause. It dealt in adjectives more than in logic, characterizing those differing from himself as either "infidels," "chickens in pantaloons," or "beer drinkers." This aggression took, and his speech was, in point of recognition by the audience, the most successful of the evening, though containing neither the evident honesty of purpose of Dr. Kerr, nor the keen intellectuality of Dr. Browne.

When he had finished, the President announced that the Convention would re-assemble at half-past nine o'clock this morning, after which the assemblage was dispersed with the benediction by Rev. Mr. Scovel.—Pittsburgh Dispatch, Feb. 5.

[TO BE CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

LEGISLATIVE HEARING.

JUST AND EQUAL TAXATION.

The Committee on Just and Equal Taxation gave their first hearing in the Green Room on the subject of the exemption or non-exemption of charitable and religious property from taxation. There was quite a large attendance, and those who favored a change in the law so that there should be no exemption of such property were first heard.

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, editor of THE INDEX, was first heard, claiming to represent the Liberal League, stating that he desired the non-exemption of such institutions from assessment and taxation, and that they shall seek relief, if at all, through legislative appropriations. The existing law created a class of privileged property, and there was danger of fostering an overgrown ecclesiasticism. The growth of the Romish Church was largely due to the exemption of its property from taxation. In 1870 the exempted property was estimated at $37,000,000 in this State, and now the amount was not less than $50,000,000. Much property was now exempt which the law was not designed to excuse. Among the property which he considered was dishonestly concealed from taxation under this law was the Wesleyan Association Building on Bromfield Street, which was mainly used for business purposes, yet was only taxed on the value of the building, $200,000, while the land, valued at $130,000, was not taxed at all. The Second Methodist Church adjoining was only taxed for $10,000, while the rent of its stores below brought $3,200 a year. The property of the Young Men's Christian Association was valued at $83,000 and only taxed for $46,000, while its rentals paid a very large per cent. on the valuation of the whole property. The people were ignorant of the amount of property that was thus exempted, and if the principle was adopted of affording relief only by special appropriations, only worthy objects would receive assistance, and frauds would be prevented. The argument that taxation was based on productiveness was untrue, and certainly there was no reason why the churches should have a large amount of productive property which was comparatively exempt from taxation.

Mr. Addison Davis argued that the Government is bound to protect all religions, but to foster none. All men had equal rights, without regard to religion. An irreligious man had the same rights under the Government as a religious man; and, therefore, the State had no right to take the infidel's money to build a Christian church. Every institution should pay for its protection, and yet when the Clarendon Street Church was burned the other day the fire was extinguished by a means of protection to support which the Church had never paid a cent.

Mr. Simon W. Hathaway argued that owing to the secrecy of this bonus it was abused. He suggested the drawing of a bill which should give the towns the right to vote whether the town would exempt such institutions in their limits. He cited the case of the Massachusetts General Hospital against the town of Somerville, where it was decided that the institution was left to determine for itself how much land it should hold.

Hon. James N. Buffum of Lynn inquired whether the Board would hold future meetings, and stated his desire to be heard.

Joseph Magoun, a mechanic, thought the mechanics' trades were a great blessing, and he did not see why the property of Harvard College should be exempt and the Taunton Locomotive Works be taxed. The principle on which the law was based was an unjust and incorrect one. If a majority of these institutions were Catholic, he supposed that the State would refuse to exempt them.

R. H. Ranney, a member of the Liberal League and one of the petitioners, said that he had eighty-eight names on the petition, and only two persons whom he had asked had refused to sign it. Many Christian people favored a change in the law, even though it was in opposition to their interest, and he read from an article in the Christian Era admitting the injustice and absurdity of the present laws, and urging Baptists to take the lead in asking for a reform.

R. P. Hallowell said this was not a new question, and that the Quakers had fought it from the beginning, and as he was a member of that sect he felt that he should be false to his sense of duty if he did not appear and enter his protest. The law was a relic of the Puritan barbarism which persecuted the Quakers. As the law stood now, all of the churches had the right to expend every dollar of their property in the promotion of their peculiar theological views. He thought it for the interest of the sects themselves that this law should be repealed.

The Rev. A. W. Stevens argued the question of justice and equity, and in considering the question in hand no man's religious creed should be taken into account. If all the religious and charitable institutions of the State were subjected to taxation, it would simply be remanding them to the virtue and benevolence of the people, and none of the deserving would suffer.

Ex-Mayor James N. Buffum expressed his hearty sympathy with the movement, which he thought was rapidly gaining ground, and urged non-exemption on the ground of justice. He hoped the whole system would be abolished.

The Committee then adjourned until Thursday of next week, at 10 o'clock, A. M.—Boston Journal, Feb. 13.

THE ILLIBERALITY OF LIBERALISM.

"Free religion" encourages its disciples to be "free" enough as to Sabbath-breaking, blasphemy, and similar immoralities, but it seems that it fails to make them "free" with their money. Not only are the so-called "Liberals" so illiberal as to demand that the civil affairs of a great nation shall be entirely conformed to their ideas, in utter disregard of the conscientious convictions of an overwhelming majority of the people, but they also appear to be quite as illiberal in the use of their money for the accomplishment of their aims. As they build no churches, support no ministry, undertake no great missionary enterprises, supply no treasuries for Bible printing and distribution, it might be expected that they would have large and even princely sums to give in furtherance of such schemes as they do undertake. . . .

The Free Religious Association of Boston has arranged for a course of lectures this winter in the lower Horticultural Hall. The first of their lectures was delivered by a gentleman from New York, the Rev. O. B. Frothingham, on the first Sabbath of the year. This prophet appears to be not altogether without honor away from his own country. Though he holds forth in his own city in a small hall to a smaller gathering of admirers, he had a most flattering audience in Boston. We are informed that "the crowd crammed themselves into Horticultural Hall till it positively steamed with perspiration, and multitudes went away disappointed because they could not get in." But let us see how generous was this flattering audience.

By arrangement of the Executive Committee of the Association, a "Donation Box" is placed at the door of the Hall. Into this the members of the audience are expected to drop their contributions toward defraying the expenses of the course of lectures—travelling expenses of lecturers, hall rent, advertising, etc. At the close of the services, the hearers' appreciation of the discourse, as measured by the contents of the box, amounted to just $5.85!!

We are thankful that the crowds who gather to hear discourses in favor of the Religious Amendment give more substantial evidence of their appreciation of the truth uttered, and the importance of the movement to be advanced.

Will not the friends of our holy cause, a cause worthy of that fine enthusiasm which rejoices in entire consecration of time, efforts, and money, give the Liberals an example of genuine Christian liberality in connection with the coming Convention? Shall not our "Donation Box" at Pittsburgh contain at least $10,000? Let our friends send on their answer. —Christian Statesman.

GOVERNMENT CHAPLAINS.

Your Demands strike key-notes of our future, which in the past and the present may be regarded as "things that were and were most dear (costly) to us." The second Demand of the nine especially strikes the sentiment of freedom of religious thought of the present age, and elicits some inquiry.

Is it Constitutional for Congress, under Article 1. of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, to fix salaries of church officials, and make appropriations of the people's money to pay salaried chaplains of Congress, the army, and the navy? It says: "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." While Congress has never passed any law prohibiting the free exercise of religion, what do we behold in this age of free thought, free speech, freedom of religious opinion? Chaplains in both Houses of Congress, the army, and the navy, salaried and paid by acts of Congress out of the public money! What else do we behold? In our military posts, navy yards, ships of war, military and naval academies, chaplains with places of worship fitted up for divine service at the public expense (some of them veritable Episcopal chapels, with chancel, rails, benches, even vestry) by expenditure of public money. It may be argued Congress did not, does not, appropriate money for such purpose; but whether this is technically true or not, the incidental expenses come out of the public treasury, and it is to that extent an unlawful diversion of the public money. It may be argued that an act of Congress empowering the President to appoint, and making appropriations to pay, chaplains is not making a law respecting the establishment of religion. It may be argued that divine service in arsenals, navy yards, and on board ships, is necessary and essential to the proper observance of the Sabbath day, and to the moral instruction and spiritual welfare of soldiers and sailors. It may be argued that this is a Christian nation, and the teachings of the Bible once a week in those several places are essential to the maintenance of that morality and virtue upon which republican government must depend for its existence; and that, therefore, paying chaplains and fitting up places of worship is not making laws respecting the establishment of religion. It may be argued that the Amendment to the Constitution meant that Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of a State religion, and that the appointment of chaplains and fitting up places of worship, out of the public money, is not a violation of the Amendment. It may be argued that the chaplains are of all sects, and that there is no sectarianism in the appointment and support of chaplains; nevertheless, they are generally selected and appointed by certain influences, religious or political, brought to bear upon the appointing power. If such acts of Congress do not make laws respecting the establishment of religion, they certainly do make laws respecting the support of religious men, and admit of the expenditure, by arbitrary authority, of the public money for religious purposes. Chaplains are a body selected from all sects of religious bodies, and therefore belong to religion in its various creeds; and being, as such, supported by the public money must come without the purview of the Amendment, which prohibits Congress from passing laws respecting religious establishments. It certainly does appear that, if it is not an establishment of religion, it is the establishment and support, by Government, of religious persons paid to preach and teach according to their own tenets. Chaplains, therefore, become the hirelings of the Government, remitting so much of their personal and even religious freedom, paid religionists maintained out of the public money, mere missionaries under military and naval orders of their bishops, the secretaries of war and the navy, whose authority they dare not question, whose mandates they must obey. They preach under that duress for their handsome salaries. Suppose all said as to Constitutional provision be admitted; then comes another aspect of the affair. The appointment of chaplains is confined to no particular sects, but reaches all sects. Then how stand matters? The chaplain of a military post, a navy yard, a ship of war, at West Point or Annapolis Academies, may be an Episcopalian, a Congregationalist, Presbyterian, Methodist, Catholic, or Unitarian. The faiths of the officers, soldiers, sailors, may be various as those of the chaplains. Suppose the chaplain is Episcopalian—what then? Some may say, "He is not of my faith; we will not attend his service." "A Methodist," some will say; "I don't hold his doctrines. I won't hear him." Some will say, "He is a dissenter; why should we be expected to go to service?" Some will say, "He is a Catholic; away with such superstition!" Others will say, "He is a Unitarian; he is no Christian! Who would hear him? Not I!"

I have been told that some dissenting chaplains adopt the Episcopal service to gratify cliques of that persuasion, and at the chapels (no doubt built by the public money) at West Point and Annapolis even don the gown and surplice of the Episcopal order, instead of preaching in their brass-buttoned uniform with shoulder straps bearing the gilded cross upon it! It looks as if there is in the army and navy, perhaps from the Episcopal service being the most aristocratic and preferred form, perhaps from its most general use at the academies, a disposition or tendency to regard it as a quasi-State religion!

Your declaration of principles—your Demands—the second prominently—commend themselves to the candid and enlightened consideration of the people, whose money seems to be expended indirectly for religious purposes. Continue to agitate, until the evil is uprooted; and let those who want chaplains in the Government institutions CALL them, and pay them from their own incomes. It seems hardly necessary for Government to be supporting chaplains and places of worship in institutions where all sects cannot have the faith of their fathers preached to them, and where there are churches of all denominations, within so easy reach, under the very shadow of walls that enclose military and naval establishments.

We are told that, in the navy, chaplains are ordered only to the flag-ship of the squadron, although there may be in the squadron several ships carrying as many officers and sailors as the flag-ship, so that one of these chaplains appears to be only an appendage to, and part of, an admiral's staff; and that only the souls accidentally on the flag-ship are to be cared for by the shepherds of the spiritual kingdom! The other ships' companies must do without preaching, and work out their salvation by their own praying.

LIBERALIST.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Jan., 1874.

"WELL, MR. ——, how do you feel?" said a friend to a defeated candidate a few days after election. "I feel, I suppose," he replied, "as Lazarus did." "How was that?" "Why," said he, "Lazarus was licked by the dogs, and so am I."

Poetry.

THE LAST WORDS OF BERENGARIUS:

OB. ANNO DOM. 1088.

BY S. T. COLERIDGE.

"No more 'twixt conscience staggering and the Pope,
Soon shall I now before my God appear,
By him to be acquitted, as I hope;
By him to be condemned, as I fear."

Lynx amid moles! Had I stood by thy bed,
"Be of good cheer, meek soul!" I would have said.
I see a hope spring from that humble fear.
All are not strong alike through storms to steer
Right onward. What though dread of threaten'd death
And dungeon torture made thy hand and breath
Inconstant to the truth within thy heart?
That truth from which, through fear, thou twice didst start
Fear haply told thee was a learned strife,
Or not so vital as to claim thy life:
And myriads had reach'd Heaven, who never knew
Where lay the difference 'twixt the false and true!

Ye who, secure 'mid trophies not your own,
Judge him who won them when he stood alone,
And proudly talk of recreant BERENGARE—
Oh, first the age, and then the man compare!
That age how dark! congenial minds how rare!
No host of friends with kindred zeal did burn!
No throbbing hearts awaited his return!
Prostrate alike when prince and peasant fell,
He only, disenchanted from the spell,
Like the weak worm that gems the starless night,
Moved in the scanty circlet of his light:
And was it strange if he withdrew the ray
That did but guide the night-birds to their prey?

The ascending Day-star with a bolder eye
Hath lit each dew-drop on our trimmer lawn!
Yet not for this, if wise, will we decry
The spots and struggles of the timid Dawn!
Lest so we attempt th' approaching NOON to scorn
The mists and painted vapors of our MORN.

GLIMPSES.

The "Congressional Petition" foots up 3,501 names in all; the "Massachusetts Petition" foots up 6,953.

The Liberal League of Boston will meet Friday evening, Feb. 20, at Parker Memorial Hall. A full meeting is desired.

Signatures to the "Congressional Petition" against tax-exemption have been received at this office since last week as follows: From John Buntin, Newburyport, Mass., 270 names; from Joseph Marsh, Northampton, Mass., 155; from Clifford C. Eaton, Cambridgeport, Mass., 57; from C. Cowing, West Roxbury, Mass., 15; from Joshua Washburn, Newton, Mass., 27; from James C. Trowbridge, Hudson, Mass., 83; from the Boston Investigator, 93. Total for the week—700 names.

It is asserted that many Methodist preachers are teaching the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked. Against this dangerous dilution of the gospel Rev. William P. Corbett, of Brooklyn, bears his solemn testimony. Nothing but hell of the old sort will suit him: "The Word says fire and brimstone; I take it just as it is there. . . . So long as I am permitted to preach the word of God, I shall, without fear or favor, tell my hearers what the gospel truth is of hell, and try to impress them with a knowledge of its reality as a burning lake of fire and brimstone, and admonish them of the danger of getting into it."

Signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition" against tax-exemption have been received as follows since last week: From John Buntin, Newburyport, 854 names; from Joseph Marsh, Northampton, 171; from George H. Foster, Boston, 165; from the Banner of Light, 101; from the Boston Investigator, 111; from Clifford C. Eaton, Cambridgeport, 58; from John H. Campbell, Charlestown, 20; from George W. Hamilton, Boston, 28; from F. B. Day, Norfolk, 6; from M. M. Haskell, Marblehead, 13; from C. Cowing, West Roxbury, 15; from F. S. Goodwin, Newburyport, 16; from Joshua Washburn, Newton, 27; from Daniel G. Crandon, Chelsea, 46; from James C. Trowbridge, Hudson, 83; from E. P. Noyes, Gardner, 92. Total for the week—1,806.

Three able articles in favor of non-exemption from taxation deserve special notice; one by Mr. Alfred E. Giles, in the Norfolk County Gazette,—one by the editor of the Congregationalist,—and one by Rev. Frederick B. Allen, in the Boston Advertiser. The last two, being from Orthodox sources, show that there are just men among the Orthodox clergy who can rise superior to their own interests. But Mr. Allen's proposal to exempt thirty thousand dollars of a church's property, and to tax the next seventy thousand dollars at only half rates, is one of the wretched compromises most to be feared just now. The principle of "No Exemption" forbids any such compromise; and the adoption of it would postpone indefinitely the triumph of justice. Beware of temporizing in reform!

The Christian Advocate thus refers to a great and growing nuisance: "We wish that our State Legislature, now in session, would do something to relieve us from the intolerable nuisance of quack medicine advertisements. It is bad enough to have half the journals in the land filling their columns with many of a downright indecent, if not criminal, character, and thrusting them thus clandestinely into our families. But these we can avoid, and should do so by excluding them from our households. For those who have eyes, however, it is not possible to turn away from the thousand and one announcements of nostrums which disfigure every wall and fence, and deface the finest effects of natural scenery."

When John Bright was asked lately what he meant by "free land," he boldly declared that the phrase means "the abolition of the law of primogeniture, and the limitation of the system of entails and settlements so that life interests may, for the most part, be got rid of, and real ownership substituted for them. It means also that it shall be as easy to buy and sell land as to buy and sell a ship, or at least as easy as it is in Australia, or in most or all of the States of the American Union. It means that no encouragement shall be given to great estates and great farms, and that the natural forces of accumulation and dispersion shall have free play." This is the hope of all true reform for labor, the "free play of the natural forces of accumulation and dispersion." Reliance on legislative interference with these forces is ruinous to all reform.

It has seemed worth while to republish in The Index a report of the Christianizers' Convention at Pittsburgh. This week we give an account of the first day's proceedings, which will be followed next week by those of the second day. The total number of delegates present is reported as 1,063. The Committee on Petitions reported 54,228 signatures in favor of the Christian Amendment; of which 4,000 had been obtained in Pittsburgh alone. Next year no National Convention is to be held, but a large number of local conventions instead. The whole energies of the Association are to be devoted to collecting further signatures. They intend to have 2,000,000 names to present to Congress in 1876, the national centennial year, in favor of their movement. We consider it by no means improbable that they will succeed in this project. Whoever believes the Christian Amendment movement to be devoid of vitality, power, or other elements of a formidable agitation, will discover his mistake in due time.

"If you, Mr. Abbot, would only see (what I am sure you have felt) that the facts of our emotional nature are as much matter for science as any other, I think you wouldn't speak so slightingly of the sentiments, the feelings, in connection with religion." So writes one of the many friends whom we have not yet seen face to face, yet whose letters make us feel keenly the loss involved in this personal non-acquaintance. If indeed we have "spoken slightingly" of the religious sentiments, we have fallen into a grievous error; and if we have seemed to do so, the hastiness and carelessness of our speech are matter of sincerest regret. Yet really we feel guiltless on this point. It is only such sentiment as would suppress or supplant thought, and would make men dwell contentedly in thoughtlessness respecting the supreme topics which interest all meditative minds, that appears to us hurtful. What our friendly correspondent thinks we do not see, we have urged again and again on the attention of radicals; as, for instance, in some numbers of The Index which we have mailed to his address. The culture and right direction of sentiment are indispensable to a large, beautiful, and sweet humanity; and the science of man is wofully imperfect which takes no note of it.

Those of our occasional contributors who fail to see their articles published in The Index, or who grow impatient at not seeing them published as soon as they may desire, should not infer that the cause is inappreciation on our part. A great many more are sent than we can possibly find room for, and we are often perplexed to decide what to print among articles that we consider equally good. The decision often turns on such trivial points as legibility, grammar, orthography, and especially brevity. Not one in twenty of those received can be sent to the compositors without considerable labor of revision; and (such is depraved human nature!) we find our choice not seldom following the "path of least resistance" in these respects. Other things being equal, an article not exceeding a column in length, written with good ink and one side of the sheet only, in a large, clear, and not too crowded hand, with reasonable care in point of spelling, construction, and style, has about five times as good a chance of publication as its less favored competitors. If you are careless in these things, do not delude yourself with the fancy that the editor has more time to spare than yourself. He is glad to receive good articles; but he cannot take the time to re-write those which are slovenly.

THE WORLD-ORCHESTRA.

What a debt of gratitude humanity owes to its great musicians! Listening recently to an overture of the peerless Beethoven, rendered as only Theodore Thomas can render it, similitudes flocked to our mind which we trust it will not be deemed an impertinence to send out as our weekly word to many friends. Those who count such things as airy nothings will know that the word is not meant for them.

The effect of a great work of musical genius depends in no small degree on the skilful use of discords,—of sounds which, taken apart from their place in the whole and repeated by themselves alone, would be simply intolerable to a sensitive ear. Whoever is incapable of relating such notes to their fellows, and perceiving with what wondrous and consummate art the master of harmony makes brief discords subservient to a larger concord,—whoever cannot unite the diverse threads of sound which, like the dancers in some intricate figure, twist in and out so subtly as to defy all effort to follow them one by one,—whoever, in short, misses the musical idea which dominates the symphony and makes it an exquisite whole in conception and execution,—may quit the concert-hall with a feeling of ennui or positive displeasure, while others may be so moved with delight as to find in the noisy applauses of the audience an offensive survival of popular barbarism. Is the case otherwise with that great symphony of Nature which men call universal Evolution? Is not that, too, a work of transcendent genius, of surpassing skill, of unutterable beauty? Has it not, also, its discords,—persistent and harsh to the ordinary ear, which takes in but a note at a time, yet brief and sweet to the ear which takes in the vast theme and general movement of the whole? Does not it, too, require that large and appreciative sympathy on the part of the listener which lets him into the artist's secret, and relates the temporary dissonances to the grand consonance of eternal harmony?

No doubt the discords of the universe are real discords, listened to in their isolation; no doubt that pain, misery, wrong, evil, are facts, judged as disconnected phenomena without reference to an all-inclusive course of Nature. If the great result of all things were possible without them,—if evolution were not necessarily a passage from the imperfect towards the perfect,—it would be in vain to seek to exonerate the universe from the charge either of cruelty or of insensibility. The only escape from such a charge, so long as the cosmos is viewed as the objective self-expression of universal Mind, is to admit that there is a nature of things which conditions all such self-expression, quite irrespective of any volition. The only way to explain the admission of even partial discords into a great musical work is to concede the impossibility of attaining general harmony of the highest order without them; and so the only way to explain the existence of evils in the vast overture of Nature is to concede the same absolute impossibility. Ultimate necessity, dependent on no will, but conditioning the exercise of all will, stands as the only explanation of evil, no matter what hypothesis of causation be adopted. The triumph of genius, however, consists in subduing the inevitable discords to the sublime harmony of a higher synthesis. So it is with the creations of human art; so it is with that marvellous history of the universe which science is just beginning to reveal, and which science itself begins to suspect is but the orchestral music of uncreated art. To perceive that all phenomena subserve an all-dominant idea, and that this idea carries up into inclusive harmony all the petty discords which seem so vast to our picayune and fragmentary philosophy, is to make Nature herself the great original of all artistic works. The altitude thus won by thought raises it above the perturbations and storms of the lower world; not blind "faith," but a clearer and higher comprehension, becomes the root of enduring peace. "On every height there dwells repose."

It is well to carry back these grand results of thought into the interpretation of the minutest details of our own private lives. The troubles and woes of our animalcular existence, the frets and worries, the griefs, temptations, and disasters that beset us day by day, are the discords which truth itself requires us to recognize as such; but which, so soon as we can conquer the inevitable smart, it is the part of wisdom to recognize also as essential elements in that larger concord which the word evolution suggests and names. It is well to rise to that higher view of human life which relates it as a tiny part to a boundless whole, and so confers upon the otherwise contemptible trivialities of life the dignity of the universal. It is well to listen intently to catch the swell of that cosmical harmony whose waves move with such majestic slowness as to be inaudible to the crowd. It is well thus to hold closely to our ear the sea-shell of thought, still resonant with the music of that limitless ocean of the All whence it came.

Equally well is it to carry the same elevated and elevating ideas into our relations with each other, and to remember that the "solidarity of man," the unity of all human interests in the last analysis, which is now an axiom of all reform, is only another name for the concord in discord we have been speaking of. Says Shelley, in his Epipsychidion:—

> "We—are we not formed, as notes of music are,
> For one another, though dissimilar;
> Such difference without discord as can make
> Those sweetest sounds, in which all spirits shake
> As trembling leaves in a continuous air?"

To perceive this deeper music of human life, which reconciles our individual differences as necessary elements in the universal harmony, is to escape much of the narrowness which disfigures character; and it tends to promote that large love of freedom which finds it impossible to quarrel with any sincere thought. The spirit of freedom is the spirit of reliance on universal Nature, the spirit of confidence that universal harmony is best secured by giving the freest possible play to the native faculties of humanity, the spirit of fearless expectation that all immediate discords thus ensuing will be caught up speedily into the general movement of the great overture of history. It is this spirit which most ennobles man, because it tends most directly to bring him into unison with the world in which he lives, no less than with the laws of his own individual development.

One word more. The human race is just beginning to recognize the existence of a world-orchestra in which it has hitherto been playing an unconscious part,—just beginning to perceive the operations of a universal law of evolution which brings beauty out of ugliness, strength out of weakness, order out of disorder, cosmos out of chaos, concord out of discord. But it does not yet perceive the full sweep of the harmony, and probably never will. This is beyond hope of attainment, until human knowledge becomes coincident with infinite truth. The grand theme of the overture of Nature can only be apprehended in part; yet enough is apprehended to make us sure that more to be apprehended yet remains. What then? Is there nowhere a complete comprehension of what seems to demand and to imply such comprehension? Has the sublimest symphony in existence, the creation of that Art which is identical with Nature, no other origin than unconscious forces, and no other audience than the human one which appreciates it so ill? Is not art the creation of mind and the appeal to mind? The artistic insight of man may be cheated in discerning the workings of universal artistic as well as plastic energy in the cosmos; but is it not as natural as breathing to infer that mind is everywhere the synonym for energy? Is not Nature at once Performer, Instrument, and Overture,—at once Orchestra and Audience? Must she not be competent to comprehend the entirety of her own work,—which man is not? Else whence that work at all, which man is slowly learning to apprehend as best he may? To him who can discern the poetry and the music of the All we leave the answering of our questions; but, remembering that the Power that pours forth its majestic symphony in the amphitheatre of infinite time and space is the same that in the tiny world of human affairs is the "Power that makes for Righteousness," we find our own answer in these lines, written at the close of the Great Rebellion:—

> "Thou hear'st the psalm of hero-lives,
> The requiem sob o'er hero-graves,
> The anthem joy in hearts of slaves,
> The rhythmic fall of broken gyves,
> "The gasp of dying wrongs and wars,
> Smitten by thy triumphant will,—
> The deep World-Music, deepening still,
> And blending with the song of stars."

REPLY TO DR. CARL H. HORSCH.

DEAR SIR:—

I cordially greet your friendly words, and should be ready to endorse nearly every word you say.

"Men love, but there is a higher, a better love; men have wisdom, but there is a higher wisdom, to which we all aspire."

With all my heart I subscribe to these words, and with you can say, "I believe."

I hope that no words of mine ever border on that cruellest of all forms of intolerance—contemptuous pity. For those who call themselves atheists or materialists, I have no feeling but that of respect. The term "unhappy men," so freely flung at Bishop Colenso and others by the Orthodox, is one I would never willingly use in the ordinary contemptuous sense. But if I speak of the "dark clouds of atheism," I mean that to me, enjoying the warm sunshine of a faith and hope which I trust are founded in fact and reason, it would be like a dark cloud to have no longer faith and hope.

If I thought any evil could permanently fall upon any one dear to me, I should be in despair. If I thought any suffering was purposeless, or not to issue in final good, I could not be happy again, unless steeped in oblivion. I do not pride myself on my convictions and hopes; but I may be permitted to cherish them with gratitude, and to do my utmost to impart them to others.

Once more, it is not death for oneself that one dreads; it is the bitter parting with the beloved—if that parting is to be forever!

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

DEAN STANLEY ON MISSIONS.

It may be an old story by this time, but to most readers of THE INDEX it will be a new and interesting fact, that Dean Stanley, on the morning of the day of Max Müller's lecture in Westminster Abbey, preached a sermon on Missions that was, in its way, quite as remarkable as the professor's discourse. The theme chosen was "The End and the Means of Christian Missions." The text was taken from Acts xxvi., 28, 29—the remark of Paul to King Agrippa,—and the lesson deduced was that Christian missionaries should aim to multiply characters which, in their finest qualities, were Pauline; to increase the number of people who, in their moral attributes, resembled Paul—"a man passionately devoted to his own faithful friends, and clinging to the reminiscences of his race and country, yet with a heart open to embrace all mankind; a man combining the strongest convictions with an unbounded toleration of differences, and an unbounded confidence in truth; a man penetrated with the freedom of the Spirit, but with a profound appreciation of the value of great existing institutions, whether civil or religious—a thorough Roman citizen, and a thorough Eastern gentleman; a career of daring fortitude and endurance, undertaken in the strength of the persuasion that in Jesus of Nazareth he had seen the highest perfection of divine and human goodness." "To create, to preach, to exhibit those traits of character, those apostolical graces, those divine intuitions, which even the hard Roman magistrate and the superficial Jewish prince recognized in Paul of Tarsus,—such is the aim which, following the example of their most illustrious predecessor, all missionaries ought to have before their eyes. Where these are, there is Christianity. Wherever, and in proportion as these are not, there the missionary's labor has failed." "This reproduction of Paul—this reproduction of all that is best in ourselves or better than ourselves—in the minds and hearts of mankind is the true work of the Christian missionary; and, in order to do this, he must be himself that which he wishes to impress upon them, in humility, goodness, courtesy, and holiness, except only the straitening bonds which cramp or confine each separate character, nation, and church. No disparager of Christian missions can dispute this—no champion of Christian missions need go beyond this."

The means proposed by the preacher were altogether suitable to this end. "In true Christian missions in the conversion of human souls from dead works, from sin, from folly, from barbarism, from hardness, from selfishness, to goodness and purity, justice and truth, the field is so vast, the diversity of character in men and nations is so infinite, the enterprise so arduous, the aspects of divine truth so various, that it is, on the one hand, a duty for each one to follow out that particular means of conversion which seems to him most efficacious, and, on the other hand, to acquiesce in the converging use of many means which cannot, by the nature of the case, appear equally efficacious to every one." "He is a traitor to the cause who exalts the means above the end, or who seeks an end altogether different from that to which his allegiance binds him." "The calm judgment of the wise and good, or the silent example, or the understanding sympathy, or the wide survey of the whole field of the religions of mankind, may awaken convictions which all the declamations of all the churches would fail to arouse." In conclusion, before announcing that Professor Müller would lecture in the afternoon, Stanley claimed for the laity a distinguished place in the ranks of useful missionaries.

If, in this short summary of the essential points of this remarkable sermon, we have laid less emphasis than was just on the preacher's prominent use of the clause "except these bonds," meaning the limitations of sect and doctrine by which Christian missionaries were trammelled, we beg our readers to bear in mind that an earnest rebuke of such limitations, both explicit and implicit, was one of the features of the address.

It is not surprising that such a preachment, introducing such a lecture as we gave an account of in our last paper, should have given extreme offence to very many of the clergy and laity of England. It is spoken of in print "as a symptom of the growing disintegration of our national church." It is declared that "if this craving for novelty, notoriety, and excitement is to go on unchecked, the beginning of the end cannot be far distant." O. B. F.

THEOLOGY AND LITERATURE.

The following statement, taken from the Independent of Feb. 5, is worth preserving in THE INDEX also; though it can hardly go without some comments:—

Our literary men and women can hardly help putting some little of their religion into their writing, and their religious sympathies are no secret. The following facts on this subject we think are accurate: Bryant is a Unitarian, and one of the vice-presidents of the American Unitarian Association, and a similar office is also held by George William Curtis, who occasionally reads sermons in the church of that denomination on Staten Island. Dr. Holmes is likewise a Unitarian of a somewhat earnest type, and other believers in the same faith are John Gorham Palfrey, the historian, who was once a clergyman; Francis Parkman, Senator Sumner, Motley, Bancroft, Whipple, Howells, Mrs. Hunt, Mrs. Spofford, Bret Harte, J. T. Trowbridge, and Mr. Godkin, of the Nation. James Freeman Clarke and Edward E. Hale are almost as well known as clergymen as men of letters. Longfellow and Lowell are Unitarians of a conservative type. With that body is also to be associated, probably, Bayard Taylor. Charles Dudley Warner and Mark Twain are Congregationalists, attending the same church in Hartford; and other Congregationalists are Dr. Holland, Lucy Larcom, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, Gail Hamilton, Horace E. Scudder, and Wendell Phillips, who used to attend the Old South, Boston, which sanctuary he still frequents, we suppose, for postal purposes. Higginson, Parton, and Cranch are Free Religionists, Col. Higginson having once been a Unitarian minister, and Mr. Cranch being a graduate of the Harvard Divinity School. Emerson and A. Bronson Alcott are, of course, Transcendentalists, and Miss L. M. Alcott's sympathies are also with this school. Epes Sargent and Robert Dale Owen are Spiritualists; Edward Eggleston is a Methodist and a doctor of divinity; Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney is a Swedenborgian; John Boyle O'Reilly is a Roman Catholic; and the Episcopalians are represented by R. H. Dana, Jr., John Hay, and Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe. Whittier is a Quaker of liberal tendencies, although he does not, we believe, call himself a Hicksite. Turning from literature to scholarship, using both terms in a free sense, of Congregationalists may be mentioned Presidents Woolsey and Porter, and Professors Whitney and Dana, of Yale; Professor Young, of Dartmouth; President Hopkins, Drs. Horace Bushnell and J. P. Thompson; Professors Bartlett, of Chicago, and Park, of Andover; George P. Marsh; J. Hammond Trumbull, of Hartford; and Professor Asa Gray, of Cambridge, who is also an earnest Darwinian. President McCosh, Dr. Hodge, Dr. Philip Schaff, and, we suppose, Professor March are Presbyterians; Ezra Abbot, F. J. Child, and Professor Peirce are Unitarians, Dr. Abbot standing, like Lowell, with the Evangelical party. Prof. Sophocles attends the Appleton Chapel (Unitarian) of Harvard College, though no great Unitarian, we believe. Dr. H. B. Hackett is a Baptist.

The above statement is accurate enough, so far as I know, though I had supposed Mr. Howells to be a Swedenborgian, and Bayard Taylar to be far too radical to be classed with Unitarians. Mrs. Spofford was brought up an Episcopalian, and I doubt if she has kept that communion, whatever her private opinion may be. It would have been more candid also to state (though perhaps the writer in the Independent did not know it) that Curtis is not only a vice-president of the Unitarian Association, but of the Free Religious Association also. But the statements, as a whole, are correct enough, probably. The editorial comments are more questionable. They are as follows:—

We have given in our literary "Notes" the religious connections, so far as known to us, of the leading writers and scholars of the country. Of course, the latter list could be indefinitely extended. We have made it purposely select. But the facts there given are sufficient to prove conclusively that in pure literature the little handful of Unitarians and Radical thinkers quite outweigh all the other religious bodies put together. The explanation is to be found, we suppose, in the fact that Harvard College belongs to the Unitarians; and Harvard College, while Prof. Channing occupied the chair of rhetoric, produced a literary impression on its pupils that is memorable in the history of education. This is certain, that Unitarianism has for thirty years had almost exclusive control of our literature. In learning, the supremacy passes easily over to the Congregationalists, whose colleges take a higher rank in scholarship than those of any other denomination.

My objection to this paragraph is not so much the kind of conceit involved in the last sentence; for each denomination naturally exalts its own scholars, and even so modest and harmless a body as the Free Religious Association would naturally ask why the names of Bartol and Frothingham, Johnson and Weiss, do not appear in the above list. My objection is to the two assumptions implied throughout these extracts,—first, that a man who is merely a scholar is a scholar, and one who happens to be also a literary man is not; and secondly, that, of all forms of scholarship, theology is necessarily the highest. Do men like Sumner and Motley, Bancroft and Parkman, Longfellow and Lowell, cease to be scholars because they are also known on both hemispheres as literary men? And are Prof. Young, of Dartmouth, and Prof. Bartlett, of Chicago, constituted eminent scholars by the fact that they are so unknown outside their own denomination that their names do not even appear in the pages of those liberal harvesters of American reputations, Drake and Hart and Underwood? I speak in no disrespect to these worthy professors who deserve, I doubt not, all that the Independent claims for them. What I object to is the system of classification which assumes that a man may be a great historian, or a great philologist, or a great statesman, and yet not rank as a scholar, because he does not know the difference between Taylorism and Tylerism. CHAPLAINS AND LAW-MAKERS.

One might suspect, from the radical spirit lately manifest in some of our Western Legislatures, that our law-makers had been reading THE INDEX or some other revolutionary sheet, and were fully determined to carry into effect at once the second Demand of Liberalism, which refers to chaplains in our Legislatures.

The Chicago Tribune informs us that the Iowa State Legislature have just been having a long and sharply contested debate over a proposition to dispense with the services of clergymen in the House.

The proposition was only defeated by a vote of 40 to 37.

The same question came up before the Wisconsin assembly and senate this year, and was the occasion of much earnest and forcible discussion, as well as what would be called irreverent mirth-making.

We have before us some of the resolutions offered in the assembly, which are astonishing indications of the rapid growth of the secular spirit, even among our usually discreet and non-committal office-holders, making them bold to an unheard-of degree.

Several men favored the proposition because they said that paying for prayers was contrary to the Constitution of the State, which expressly provides that "no man shall be compelled to attend any place of worship or maintain a ministry against his consent, nor shall any money be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies." This point was well taken and strongly urged. It should have been urged at a previous session when several thousand dollars of State money were appropriated toward the support of a Catholic charity school in Milwaukee.

One man boldly declared that he had no religious belief whatever, and he did not wish any form of worship imposed on him. He said that he was willing that others who desired should engage in prayer, and he proposed that, at the opening of each daily session, there should be silence for the space of three minutes, during which any who wished should engage in silent devotion; but he wanted no praying preacher to "dictate to him in prayer." He wanted liberty to answer any man, or raise a point of order perhaps; or perhaps he was thinking of that unctuous electioneering chaplain of the Massachusetts Legislature who, a year or more ago, under cover of addressing the Almighty Lawgiver, slipped in a word of advice to the gentlemen of the Legislature to vote for the prohibitory bill; or perhaps he felt like a hard-fisted Granger we met a day ago, who criticised the good taste of the Chaplain of the United States Senate, who thanked the Lord for the repeal of the Salary-Grab Law, saying with a sort of contempt for the roundabout way of looking for Providence—"He had better thank the people who forced our Congress to repeal it."

But it was quite as much by the facetious and ridiculous propositions offered as by the serious, earnest debate that the spirit of the assembly was shown.

The proposition to dispense with a chaplain was lost, we believe, by a small majority. Then there was a proposition made to prohibit pay for such services; this was also defeated by a vote of 53 to 42. One of the rejected motions was, "that not more than five dollars per day should be paid for prayers by the clergy, and that eight hours' work in prayer should constitute a day's work." He was in favor of the Government eight-hour law. But eight-hour prayers would have been a little too much, even for one of the good old Puritan preachers.

Another man, who evidently does not believe in the "atonement through Jesus Christ our Lord," offered the following resolution:—

WHEREAS, The tax-payers and Grangers of this State desire that all middle-men should be dispensed with, and as the opening of the sessions of this House by prayer from the resident clergy would be an act attended with considerable expense to the State; therefore,

Resolved, That, instead of the clergy of the city opening the sessions by prayer, that duty shall be performed by the members. The member whose name shall be found at the head of the list as arranged by the clerk shall be the first to perform that duty; the next man on the roll to perform the duty the day following; this to continue until the whole list shall have been gone through with. In case of the absence of any member on the day when this duty shall be required of him, then the duty shall be performed by the Speaker.

This was amended so as to devolve the duty wholly on the Speaker—who is not a particularly pious man,—and rejected.

Although this attempt, like that in the Iowa Legislature to dispense with the prayers of clergymen in Legislatures, was this year defeated, the fact that it was made at all, the additional fact that it was only defeated by small majorities, and above all the bold spirit of the opposition, who dare even to fling contempt into the face of the old ideas, are sufficient assurance that the effort will be renewed next year, and every year thereafter, until this lingering relic of theocracy, of the once strong bond of Church and State, is cut clean off, and our law-makers are left, without "benefit of clergy," to wander among the intricacies of Blackstone, with nothing to guide them but the light of reason and common sense. For the sake of religion, as well as for the good of the Church, we pray in secret that this may come speedily; and in the West, our "great West," it will come, we believe, before it comes to Massachusetts, though she rocked the "Cradle of Liberty." CHURCH EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION: TWO PRACTICAL OBJECTIONS.

The exemption from taxation of churches or theological institutions extends also to benevolent societies, to which some would even more apply the adjective religious.

At first sight, this seems to be a very natural and proper arrangement which commends itself to the lover of humanity. To tax, for the benefit of the State, property which is to be used for the special good of the poor or suffering of the community seems like robbing Peter to pay Paul; and, as we are all pleased with any charity which does not withdraw money from our own pockets, we are apt to rejoice at a State appropriation or remission of taxes to any philanthropic institution.

But there seem to be two practical difficulties in this measure; and they are so important that I have known the most earnest and devoted philanthropist refuse to ask legislative help for the charity in which he was most interested, because he conscientiously believed it to encourage a false policy on the part of the State.

In the first place, the State is either obliged to constitute itself a judge between the different charities asking assistance, or else to give to all alike, or to balance the claims of one sect or party against another.

Now there is a great deal of bigotry, sectarianism, and honest difference of opinion, as regards the value of charities.

Take hospitals, for instance. We have those of the old or "allopathic" school, of the new or "homœopathic" school, of the "hydropathic" and other minor schools, and some where the hospital claims to be supported by prayer, even if its physicians do not consistently rely solely upon it as a means of cure. Some of these are considered by others to do only a minimum of good to the community for the money they expend, or perhaps even positive harm. Yet the friends of these institutions are represented in every legislature, and the rights of one urged as strongly as the other.

A federal officer once said to the representatives of a society: "If you would call yourself by a sectarian name, I could do something for you, because I should then have the plea that I must do it to offset what have done for other sects."

So this favoring of charities or institutions by the State indirectly fosters sectarianism, and tends to the multiplication of institutions for the same object when fewer would suffice, which is an evil to the community.

The exemption from taxation has another injurious effect upon charitable societies. As the law must set some limits, it provides that only the real estate actually in use for the objects of the association shall remain untaxed. Consequently, as soon as an association secures its land, it hastens to erect its building, hurries it along to its completion, and puts in a nominal occupation, if possible, before the annual visit of the assessor, in order to avoid paying the taxes on the land. The old proverb, "More haste worse speed," is often applicable to building, and the extra expense from hasty construction is liable to be more than the taxes saved. But there is nothing which men would not do, rather than pay their taxes.

It seems impossible to rid people of the idea that all which can be got out of the Government is a spoiling of the enemy; they do not see that, if all are taxed equally or all are untaxed, the result is the same as regards the sum of money which the community can use for religion or charity.

We put a special tax on theatres, and relieve churches of all sorts; and yet I doubt not there are those who honestly believe that a well endowed and well managed theatre, which in consequence of its independence of the public could lead the popular taste instead of following it, would do more good to the morals of the community than some churches.

A good anecdote is told of John Quincy Adams. He owned some land which was necessary to afford light or passage way to Tremont Temple, when it was transformed from a theatre to a church. A committee was appointed to wait upon him, hoping that he would abate something of the price of his land for such a purpose. After hearing their arguments, he replied: "Gentlemen, I am always glad to hear of a new church being built, but I am very sorry Boston cannot support one good theatre." Accordingly he refused to bate one jot of his just price. Now if he was unwilling as an individual to grant favors to this society, why should he do so as one of the corporate body, the State?

If a good institution which is fostering religion or doing good to the poor should not pay taxes to the State, why should a good individual who is doing the same service?

In old times, clergymen never paid any doctors' fees; but the custom was found to be as burdensome to the clergy as to the medical faculty, since the poor clergyman must submit to be killed or cured by the doctor of his own church, whatever his professional value might happen to be; and the doctor was at the beck and call of the most unreasonable member of the minister's family.

I remember a good woman who during the war complained (not on good woman suffrage ground) of the amount of her taxes. She said it did seem too bad to pay so much money to the Government; she would so much rather have "given it to the soldiers." She did not consider where the soldiers' pay was coming from.

The man who builds a street of good convenient houses for the laboring classes is doing as much good to humanity as he who builds a college, a hospital, or a church; yet his property pays taxes to the State. Why should not all property be fairly taxed according to its actual value? Then the rate of taxation would be proportionally lower, and every man could give for the support of his religious views, or the charity which commended itself to his heart, the more abundantly. E. EVERY STATE of the Union has normal schools except Texas and Nevada. Massachusetts has one normal school for every 208,193 of her population; Illinois ranks next, having one normal school for every 254,941; Ohio has one for 296,140; and New York has the greatest number of normal schools, yet only one for every 398,432 of her population. The whole number of normal institutions in the United States is 114, of which 51 are State schools, 16 city schools, 27 connected with colleges and universities, and the remainder supported in various ways. There are 10,922 pupils in these schools, and 445 teachers. Nearly one-tenth of all the normal pupils in the country belong to the Female Normal College of New York City. During the three years that the college has been in existence not a single student has been expelled, not one suspended, and not more than half a dozen cases for discipline have been reported to the president, and these were but for trivial offences.—Appletons' Journal.

OF THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF WASHINGTON, D.C.

1. The regular meetings of the League shall be held on the first Sunday in each month, at 3 o'clock P.M., omitting the months of July, August, and September.

2. Special meetings may be called by the Executive Committee, upon giving at least twenty-four hours' notice to each member.

3. Seven members shall constitute a quorum.

4. The election of officers shall be held at the regular meeting in January.

5. The funds required for the purposes of the League shall be procured by subscription or voluntary contribution.

6. No debt beyond the amount of money in the hands of the Treasurer shall be incurred by the League.

7. These by-laws may be changed at any meeting of the League, upon notice being given at a previous meeting, by a two-thirds vote of the members present.

THOMAS PAINE'S BIRTHDAY.

The Scandinavian Freethinker Society, at Chicago, held their fourth annual festival in remembrance of Thomas Paine, January 29. The attendance was very large (about five hundred), the sexes being equally represented. The first speaker, Mr. N. C. Dahl, read a very able paper on the life and career of Thomas Paine. He said that Christ was a great pioneer of civilization, and that Paine was his worthy successor. Thomas Paine's creed was thus simply and grandly announced: "The world is my country, and to do good is my religion." His teachings disenthralled the mind from the tyranny of priestcraft, and placed rationalism on the highest pedestal, where it rightfully belonged. Like Paine, he, the speaker, believed in one God, and in one alone. (Applause.) The next speaker, Dr. Paoli, delivered an extended oration on the services of Mr. Paine in the cause of American liberty. Like all benefactors of the human race, Paine had, during his life, to encounter the storm of prejudice raised by the conservators of human slavery, but, in the end, his principles have triumphed, and the glorious Declaration of American Independence set forth his creed in language that had been interpreted by every heart that loved liberty, in every land beneath the sun. (Great applause.)

Brief speeches were then delivered by Mr. Mark Thrane and by Dr. Woodbury, of the Free Religious Society. After the speeches a "Freethinker comedy," written expressly for the evening by Mark Thrane, was played by amateurs. The title of the comedy was "The Old Adam," and its aim was to show how the peace of a happy family for a while was disturbed by a rascal of a preacher. The comedy was well performed and received with great applause. The evening concluded with a dance, in which all partook till four o'clock.

RELIGION — CHRISTIANITY — FREE RELIGION.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

THE INDEX of the last two weeks (numbers 213 and 214) brought us two excellent sermons, the one by Mr. Potter and the other by Mr. Bartol, both on the subject of the dropping of Mr. Potter's name from the Year Book. Both Mr. Potter and Mr. Bartol protest eloquently against giving to the name "Christian" the narrow and circumscribed meaning given to it by theologians and sectarians. Although both sermons are very fine, I yet think Mr. Potter's the better, because it is historically and philosophically the stronger. Yet he (and even more so Mr. Bartol), while extending and generalizing the signification of the name "Christian," claim decidedly too much for it. In doing so, it seems to me, they partly destroy their own strongest parts by bestowing, in Christian fashion, too much love on Christ, too much praise on Christianity, and too great a value on being a Christian. "So long, at least," says Mr. Potter, "and as often as this Christian season comes round, can we not forget what the world owes and what we especially owe to the saintly and heroic life of him whose birth the festival commemorates, nor forget that the religion which bears his name, notwithstanding all the corruptions and theological bitterness that have attended its course, has yet had the grand ideal aim of that old legendary song which sung itself into the faith of the early Church, 'Peace on earth, and good-will to men.'"

Now, Mr. Editor, if any "Christian" minister had spoken in that manner, I would scarcely have had anything to say against it; we are so used to having Christ, Christianity, and Christians thus unduly eulogized that, if any one should undertake to censure all such preachings, the time from one Sunday to another would be much too short for him. But when the same hackneyed talk is uttered by such men as Mr. Potter and Mr. Bartol, I must protest against it. I would certainly have supposed the preacher who could delineate so finely and philosophically the natural evolution of Christianity from pre-Christian historic conditions could never thus be carried away by Christian self-eulogy. As for the "saintly and heroic life of him whose birth the festival commemorates," I would merely remind Mr. Potter that this "birth" is still a matter of dispute among men of learning, not merely, however, as to its date (for the popular date is settled beyond dispute as false), but even as to his ever having had any "birth" and even "life" (saintly and heroical or otherwise) at all. Historically, neither the one nor the other can be proved. But there is very good reason to believe that the opinions and philosophy of the contemporary Gnostics, denying the birth and bodily existence of Christ, and regarding him as but a "spirit," the "Logos" of the Greeks, was much more correct than "the faith of the early Church;" and these Gnostic speculations and other myths became the foundation of the later Christian legends and "faith." It would, then, it seems to me, have been much wiser in both Mr. Potter and Mr. Bartol, while generalizing the meaning of the name "Christian," to have followed that "tendency among the liberal and progressive minds of all faiths to define their religion by its universal rather than by its special beliefs," than to have thus followed the vulgar custom of Christian priests and Christian writers and believers.

But more strongly yet must I protest, Mr. Editor, against claiming too much for "the religion that bears his name," and against conceding that it "yet has had the grand ideal aim of that legendary song which sung itself into the faith of the early Church;" or, as Mr. Bartol puts it: "What is the object of Christianity, or of being a Christian, but to be a good man?"

To disprove this claim, I will not bore you, Mr. Editor, nor your readers, with the numerous and well-known facts of history to the contrary, easy and tempting as they may be, but will only state, what every unbiased thinker will readily admit to be true, that "the grand ideal aim" Christianity ever had, and which it ever most energetically strove to realize, was power; and, having gained it, to use it for still more power, and its own aggrandizement! The rights, liberties, and well-being of men were most cruelly sacrificed to this, its "grand ideal aim," and knowledge, civilization, and secular improvements were opposed by it with all its power. In vain plead its apologists that this was not chargeable to Christianity, but to the character of the times and faults of men. These very men were the representatives of the Church, the propounders, teachers, and lights of Christianity.

It must, in fairness, however, be admitted that in this respect Christianity is neither worse nor better than any other form of religion. It is religion itself, so-called, it is ecclesiasticism, and not Christianity as such, that is the source of all the corruptions and all the misdeeds that are charged especially to the latter. I have here to reiterate again most emphatically what I on former occasions stated to you, and defended against your opposition, namely: There is no "pure religion" in all the various forms of religion, existing or ever having existed. There is in all, even the best, too much ecclesiasticism that passes for religion, too much fraud, too much priestcraft, and ever will be, no matter how much "liberalized" it is, as long as it is in the hands of "reverends" for safekeeping. Take the late action of the Unitarian Association, an ecclesiastical body of the most liberal religion, as an instance and proof.

Free Religion alone, because, in the above sense, no religion, has the germ in it to become indeed pure, or purer, religion, and truly freer than all other religions; not merely because it is free from all forms and dogmas, but mainly and substantially because it has no ecclesiastics. It is, however, too young yet to make any sure prediction of its future. It is, thus far, merely a germ of what it may be some happy day; and it would be too hazardous to foretell now what it will be. All that we can do now is to work for the favorable development of its now promising germ, and to hope for its future blossom and gratifying fruit.

THE SOUL FIRST OF ALL.

F. E. ABBOT:

My Friend,—Allow me a word suggested by the admirable letter of C. D. B. Mills and by your thoughtful remarks thereon, both called out by your notice of Dr. Bartol's book, The Rising Faith.

In that notice you say: "The age of faith has gone, the age of knowledge has come." Of course you meant faith in theological dogmas, as authority; but may I change your statement a little, and say: "The age of blind faith has gone, the age of wisdom has come?" Knowledge is in the realm of facts; wisdom is in the realm of ideas, principles, and laws. Plenty of men know many facts, but are not wise enough to go back of the fact to the idea or the law.

With the decay of faith in dogmas is coming the better day of faith in the soul, and in the truths of the soul. All that is in the Infinite Spirit is in the spirit of man, less in degree and scope, but the same in kind. Justice, love, freedom, fraternity, immortality, are in and of us. The pulsing tides of Infinite Being flow through, and make up and enrich, this humanity of ours in its spiritual aspects; and from the spirit of man, as from a fountain of living waters, the intuitions leap up and sparkle like purest gems. They are voices from the inner temple.

Love is spontaneous, and asks no leave to be; and, when "the impulses of love are governed by the voice of wisdom," come the sweet delights of wedded life, the tender care of childhood, the divine joy of friendship, the glad results of philanthropy working out reforms. Justice is from within, and comes up first as an impulse, perhaps as an indignation against wrong. It grows with the ages, gets written on statute books, rules in common life, is a corner-stone of civilization, and an element without which culture is but veneering and sham.

So of freedom and fraternity. Experience illustrates and emphasizes their benefits, and helps their solid growth, and our faith in them; but, before experience was, were these interior realities, these truths of the soul. Abolitionists never wasted a moment to prove, as they were asked to do, a man's right to himself. It needed no proof; it was self-evident: the slave-holder knew it, if he would be but brave and serene enough to listen to and obey the voice within. These realities of the within never contradict or crucify reason or experience, but are verified by both, and thus all are in accord.

We hear praises of fidelity, and are told (truly, as I think,) that religion, free and rational, will bring a finer and higher fidelity.

But what are we to be faithful to? When Shakpeare said:—

> "First to thyself be true,
> And it shall follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man,"—

what did he mean? Intuitive, as the poet must be to be worthy the name, he turned within to those high qualities of honor and reverence and fraternity that he knew were in and of the spirit of man, making up its very nature and being, and by virtue of which it is immortal.

Knowledge, experience, and reason, are not to be set aside or slighted; but back of all is the soul, and all these are but the processes of its life and being.

This is the "method" that seems to me true. The truths within are "first things," and reason and experience will but verify and illustrate them.

Herbert Spencer gropes about in the chill twilight of "the unknown and the unknowable," and I confess to this same feeling of breathing a thin and frigid air, when the method I speak of is departed from. I know something of Infinite Justice and Love because something of them is in me, as the child knows something of the ocean, even by standing on the beach and hearing the grand music of its beating waves, or holding an ear to the sea-shell and marvelling at the fine, sweet murmur that comes therefrom.

The forces that move, and the powers that uphold, this world are intangible to the outward senses, imponderable to our finest tests; yet they control and inspire all! Science goes back to the protoplasm, but back of that is the vitalizing "soul of things" that shapes the germ into myriad forms. Well says our friend Mills: "Within seen is unseen, within form substance, beneath manifestation life, beyond finite infinite."

That "substance" within form is fine and subtile, yet solid and real.

Well says S. J. Finney (not of Oberlin): "The substance of the world is the intelligence in the world, and that intelligence is revealed primarily—not to but in man. . . . The rocks, hills, valleys, rivers, ocean, and stars gleam with the white splendor of the Divine Reason. . . . The bosom of man contains the germs of all conceivable grace, personal perfection, and spiritual beauty. The glory of sun and stars is eclipsed by the glory of that reason, of that soul, that can weigh and measure sun and stars."

But I must stop, for this great matter waxes greater in my thought. I feel deeply that this allegiance and reverence for the truth within must take place of this idolatry of authority without. So will reason do its noble work; so will experience have its due weight; so will inductive research and experiment help us greatly; yet so will reverence, aspiration, faith, and religion grow in beauty, and lift life up to a more divine height. This is only my contribution toward that truth we are all seeking.

Fraternally yours,

G. B. STEBBINS.

DETROIT, Mich., Jan. 29, 1874.

THE PETER'S PENCE FUND.—It is well known that of late years His Holiness Pope Pius has been very largely supported by the contributions of "the faithful" throughout the world, which have been collected under the ancient and historic name of St. Peter's Pence. The Unita Cattolica gives the following statistics of the annual receipts, which, we believe, have never before been published together: In 1861 the "Pence" amounted to 14,184,000 francs; in 1862 to 9,402,000; in 1863 to 7,047,000; in 1864 to 5,832,000; in 1865 to 6,445,000; in 1866 to 5,939,000; in 1867 to 11,312,000; in 1868 to 11,000,000; thus giving a total of 71,161,000 francs in eight years. The exact sums collected in the last four or five years are not given, but the same authority states that they are greatly in excess of previous years, and reckons that the total of "Peter's Pence" collected up to the present time cannot fall much short of 400,000,000 francs. The great falling off in the years 1863–66 is accounted for by the same authority and by Catholic opinion on the ground of the general belief then prevailing that, after all, the temporal possessions of His Holiness were safe, and that, consequently, he had less urgent need of external subsidies.

THE SAME Congregationalist which asks, after quoting the Register's comments on some of the reported "high-horsitudes" of the pastor of Park Street Church, "Whose cock-and-bull comes next?" contains the story of a Welsh "Congregational" minister, who has tried Unitarianism in America, but renounced it because he found "there was too much Christ in his sermons for the Unitarian demand, and too much faith for the followers of THE INDEX." The Rev. F. Hayden Williams was a Unitarian only about six or eight weeks after he came to this country. He never preached in any Unitarian church east of Meadville. After preaching at Meadville two Sundays, and at Omaha three Sundays, he seems to have received the impression at the latter place that Unitarians are a Christless set, and THE INDEX is their organ! Mr. Williams' "cock-and-bull" story "comes next," and the Congregationalist seems to believe it. Perhaps it can induce the Tract Society to publish a pamphlet entitled "Unitarianism Exposed. By a Welsh clergyman who supplied Unitarian pulpits for five Sundays." When Mr. Williams learns that some "Congregational" ministers are among THE INDEX subscribers and readers, perhaps he will renounce "Congregationalism" again.—Christian Register.

A CONNECTICUT man hung himself, and a jury of his neighbors was impaneled in accordance with the requirements of the case. After a mature deliberation upon the evidence adduced, one of the number was asked what conclusion he had reached, when he frankly responded: "Oh, there haint the least mossel of doubt in my mind of the critter's guilt."

THE WASHINGTON Chronicle says that "a colored gentleman recently elected to Congress from Alabama has shown his devotion to the State by nine years' service in the penitentiary." That negro will be hanged yet, before he is done with it. He couldn't have helped going to the penitentiary, of course, but he might have kept out of Congress.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

MUMMY-MAKING is a staple Parisian industry, and the products of it are exported into all countries, and even into Egypt itself. One man alone is said to have manufactured no fewer than six hundred for provincial museums. Very little stock in hand is required to set up the business; some linen bands and plenty of dogs' skins being the principal articles necessary to make these relics of the Ptoleman era. The mummies are ticketed "Cheops," "Pharoah," &c.

A SCHOOL-BOY being requested to write a composition upon the subject of "Pins," produced the following: "Pins are very useful. They have saved the lives of a great many men, women, and children — in fact, whole families." "How so?" asked the puzzled teacher; and the boy replied, "Why, by not swallowing them." This matches the story of the other boy, who defined salt as "the stuff that makes potatoes taste bad when you don't put on any."

WE DO NOT INDORSE the irreverent remarks of Western papers regarding Brother Hammond, who is a great and good man; and it is inexpressibly sad to read in a Western paper: "How unfortunate it was that the Reverend Hammond had not been appointed a special commissioner to the Modocs in place of General Canby. A valuable military officer would thus have been saved to the nation, and Hammond would have been placed where he would do the most good."—Rochester Democrat.

A TOUCHING incident is reported from Chattanooga. An utter stranger called on a respectable farmer last week, and asked him if his house had not been robbed during the war. The farmer replied that it had. "I," said the stranger, "was one of a marauding party that did it. I took a little silver locket." "That locket," said the farmer, "had been worn by my dear, dead child." "Here it is," replied the stranger, visibly affected. "I am rich; let me make restitution; here are $20 for your little son." He gave the farmer a $50 bill and received $30 in change. He then wrung the farmer's hand warmly and left. The farmer has since dried his tears and loaded his shotgun. The $50 bill was bad.

ELI PERKINS, in the Graphic, gives certain weak points in society a good many hard rubs. The following is exaggerated, perhaps, but points a moral nevertheless:—

A young lady who attends Madame Meers' school came home to her mother, on Madison avenue, recently, and said that she "didn't like to go to school any more for—for—"

"For what, Jennie?" asked her mother.

"Why, because some of the girls swear, ma."

"Swear, Jane! Good Lord, what do you mean?"

"I mean they use bad words, ma, I—"

"Good Heavens, child! run and tell your grandma to come here."

[Enter Grandmother.]

"What is it, Marion?" asked grandma, looking over her glasses.

"Why, goodness gracious, mother! what do you think? Why, Jennie says the girls swear, they—"

"Lord o' mercy, Marion! Heaven knows what we'll come to next. Lord knows we've been too precious careful of our children to have 'em ruined by any such infernal devilishness."

"I wish to Heaven—but here, Jennie" (catching hold of the child), "tell me now—what do those girls say?"

"Why, Lizzie Mason talks about Madam Leverett, and Lizzie Smith says she'd rather ride up to see McComb's dam than to have a front seat at the Fordam races."

"Good Lord, Jennie! how you startled me!"

BUST OF

THEODORE PARKER,

BY

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak, then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished in plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY.

EVERY SATURDAY.

The Atlantic, for 1874, begins its thirty-third volume under the most prosperous auspices. The new publishers will spare no pains to keep it the Leading American Magazine, containing the fresh writings of Longfellow, Lowell, Aldrich, Parton, Whittier, Howells, Warner, Owen, Holmes, Bayard Taylor, Wells, Eggleston, with able criticisms upon current literature, art, and science.

Prudence Palfrey, a delightful novel by T. B. Aldrich, is begun in the January number, and
A Serial Story, by W. D. Howells, will begin in an early number.
Personal Reminiscences, by J. G. Whittier, will cover an eventful period in our history, and Life in the Confederate States, by a Confederate, will be an inside view of recent history.
Charles Dudley Warner's Saunterings in the British Provinces will be continued in subsequent numbers.
Robert Dale Owen's Autobiography, which has attracted so much attention, will be resumed, and chapters of peculiar interest will appear.
Local Taxation in the United States, the article in the first number by David A. Wells, will be followed by others from the same hand, on questions of Finance and Political Economy,

And there is every promise of the ablest and most attractive volume of The Atlantic ever published.

TERMS.—Single or specimen numbers, 35 cents. Yearly subscription, $4. The Atlantic and Every Saturday ($5) sent to one address for $8.

Every Saturday, a Journal of Choice Reading (Established January, 1866).—While retaining the prominent characteristics which have long made Every Saturday a favorite journal for the Fireside and the Railway, the forthcoming series will embrace several fresh and attractive features, among which may be mentioned Original American Stories, of which the first will be a serial, entitled "His Two Wives," a story of married life, by Mary Clemmer Ames, and a new Editorial Department devoted to the discussion of home literary, social, and scientific topics.

Under its new management Every Saturday will continue to lay before its readers each week the cream of the foreign weekly and monthly periodicals, giving in a compact and elegant form a larger amount and a greater variety of choice reading matter than is obtainable in any other publication of the same price.

The plan of Every Saturday embraces Serial Tales, Short Stories, Critical and Descriptive Essays, Sketches of Travel and Adventure, Poems, Biographical Papers, Papers on Popular Science, Literary Information; in fine, whatever contributes to produce a Weekly acceptable and attractive to all classes of intelligent American readers.

TERMS.—Weekly Parts, 10 cents; Monthly Parts, 50 cents; Yearly Subscription, $5.

N.B.—The Atlantic Monthly and Every Saturday sent to one address for $8.

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also, that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

Form a Liberal League,

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

THE WORD—A Monthly Journal of Reform

—Regarding the subjection of Labor, of Woman, and the Prevalence of War as unnatural evils, induced by false claims to obedience and service, favors the Abolition of the State, of Property in Land and its kindred resources, of speculative income and all other means whereby Intrusion acquires wealth and power at the expense of Useful People. Since Labor is the source of Wealth and creates all values equitably vendible, THE WORD (not by restrictive methods, but through liberation and reciprocity) seeks the extinction of interest, rent, dividends, and profit, except as they represent work done; the abolition of railway, telegraphic, banking, trades-union and other corporations charging more than actual cost for values furnished, and the repudiation of all so-called debts, the principal whereof has been paid, in the form of interest.

$5 TO $20 PER DAY easily made by any one. We want men, women, boys, and girls all over the country to sell our fine Steel Engravings, Chromos, Crayon Drawings, Illuminations, Photographs, etc., etc. We now publish the finest assortment ever placed before the public, and our prices are marked down so low as to defy all competition. No one subscribes for a premium-giving paper in order to get a picture, after seeing our pictures and learning our prices. We have many old agents at work for us, who have made canvassing for books, papers, etc., their business for years, and they all report that they can make much more money at work for us than at anything else. Our prices are so low that all can afford to purchase, and therefore the pictures sell at sight at almost every house. New beginners do as well as agents who have had large experience, for our beautiful subjects and low prices are appreciated by all. To make large sales everywhere all an agent has to do is to show the pictures from house to house. Don't look for work elsewhere until you have seen what great inducements we offer you to make money. We have not space to explain all here, but send us your address and we will send full particulars, free, by mail. Don't delay if you want profitable work for your leisure hours, or for your whole time. Now is the favorable time to engage in this business. Our pictures are the finest and most pleasing in this country, and are endorsed by all the leading papers, including the New York Herald. Those who cannot give the business their entire attention can work up their own localities, and make a handsome sum without ever being away from home over night. Let all who want pleasant, profitable employment, without risking capital, send us their addresses at once, and learn all about the business for themselves. Address

VOLUME 5. BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1874. WHOLE NO. 218.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

ONE HUNDRED members of our present Congress fought in the rebellion, and twenty-six of them were confederates.

MISS LOUISE S. HOTCHKISS read a highly interesting and valuable paper before the Second Radical Club, last Monday evening, entitled "Primary Steps in Self-Government."

JOSIAH WARREN says: "It is philosophically wrong to punish people for being what their birth, training, and surroundings make them." This suggestion will bear thinking over.

THE PRESENT emperor of China is said to have a library consisting of four hundred thousand volumes. There are probably about a hundred thousand of these that he has never read.

REV. DR. BARTOL is to read an essay, on "Conditions of a Better Race," to the Moral Education Association, Friday, March 6, at 3 P.M., at 3 Tremont Place. The meeting will be public and free.

THE DOVER, N. H., Star says well that "the old Bay State has often spoken nobly, but the sentence in which she magnanimously takes back her accusation against Charles Sumner will hereafter stand among the finest of her utterances."

THE JACKSON (Tennessee) Herald says that a gentleman in that city has preserved in alcohol a bed-bug which was caught in a bed on which General Jackson slept! We trust that the general and the insect were never contemporaneous occupants of the same couch.

ALVAN CLARK, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, has made a telescope for the Naval Observatory at Washington, recently mounted there, which is said to be the most powerful instrument of the kind in the world. It has an aperture of twenty-six inches, and a focal length of thirty-five feet.

WE ARE TOLD that a Society has been formed, in Belgium, for collecting waste paper and selling it for the pope. Appeals are made to all possessors of "bad books, such as the works of Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot, Volney, and other detestable authors," to hand them over as waste paper. Would the Society be willing to purchase at a fair price a lot of superfluous back numbers of THE INDEX?

"IT IS NOT what a man denies or accepts that makes him a Christian," says Mr. Beecher; "the man whose thought, temper, speech, and action show him to be most like the Lord Jesus, is most a Christian." Surely, "Christian" liberality cannot go farther than this, in its definition of what it is to be a Christian. But such a definition is dreadfully inconsistent with historic and instituted Christianity.

WE ARE GLAD that THE INDEX has the benefit of Mrs. Cheney's paragraph in regard to the hissing of Mrs. Pierce, to which we alluded last week. If there was any wrong impression conveyed in our "Note," i is well to have it set right. Our remark was that "the audience" hissed Mrs. Pierce; not that "the leaders of the movement" did so, some of whom, we know very well, are quite incapable of any such disgraceful sign of disapprobation. Our criticism was upon the hissing itself; and we made it, not in the spirit of opposition to, but in favor of, the cause of woman suffrage.

WE ARE heartily sorry that Edwin Booth has failed financially. He is a magnificent actor, and a real and modest gentleman. No reckless spendthrift is he, wasting his money in riotous and licentious living, but a hard and patient student of his art, a quiet and domestic citizen. It is said that his great earnings have been spent in trying to sustain the legitimate drama in New York, in seeking to educate the New York stage and public up to an appreciation of Shakspearian art. So far as this may have been his object and effort, he was a true benefactor and civilizer of his race. We sincerely hope that he will soon recover from his misfortunes, and live long to adorn and elevate the American stage.

MR. LELAND once heard a gipsy and his wife disputing about God. "Both admitted that there was a great elder, grown-up God, and a smaller, younger God. But the wife maintained that the great God no longer reigned, having abdicated in favor of his son; while the husband declared that the great older God died long ago, and that the world was now governed by the little God, who was, however, the son not of his predecessor but of a poor carpenter." Christians, generally, would appear to agree more with the gipsy husband than with the gipsy wife; for they give greater worship to the "little God" than to the "great God."

A NEW Free Religious Society has been organized in Providence, R.I. It held its opening exercises last Sunday, when an audience of more than one hundred gathered to listen to an address on "What is Free Religion?" The President is Dr. L. F. C. Garvin; Vice-Presidents—Mrs. Elizabeth B. Chase, Dr. Wm. F. Channing, Orray A. Taft. Secretary, Lilly B. Chase. Treasurer, Wm. P. Thornton. Executive Committee—Arnold B. Chase, C. A. Day, Dr. Wm. F. Channing, Dr. L. F. C. Garvin, Mrs. E. F. Dow, Mrs. Anna E. Aldrich, Marcus T. Janes. The new society opens under the most flattering auspices, and we hail its prospect of coming prosperity and usefulness. Mr. Wm. C. Gannett will speak to it next Sunday, and it hopes to continue to have regular Sunday services.

GEORGE WASHINGTON—says his biographer, Mr. Sparks—had one hundred and ten rules which he made for the guide of his own conduct. We have great respect for the father of our country, but we must say that we think he went beyond all reason in the number of rules that he made for himself. It must have taken a great deal of his valuable time to keep them all vividly in mind; and it must have embarrassed fearfully the spontaneous flow of his action to have had to stop, at a critical moment, and think which one of the one hundred and ten applied at that given time. The thought timidly occurs to our mind, that the somewhat stiff and severe manner which Mr. Washington proverbially had might have been owing to the excessive number of rules which he took upon himself to observe. We think Davy Crockett's plan was better, to have only one rule—"Be sure you're right, and then go ahead."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Boston Journal, describing a recent religious celebration by the Chinese, in New York, of their New Year, says:—

"Several years ago the Baxter Street Chinamen attempted to form a New Year's procession on the sidewalk, but the wicked little street gamins pelted the Celestials so severely with snowballs that the procession was broken up, and the Chinamen were glad to scamper back into their temple. The Chinamen are quiet and inoffensive. They seldom give the police any trouble. As their religious rites are not very noisy or obnoxious, the police allow them to carry on their peculiar worship as they please."

The police are very kind, indeed! What right have they to meddle with the Chinese worship at all? Did not the Pilgrims come here to worship God according to the dictate of their own conscience?—and what more do the Chinese propose to do? It would have been more in the line of their service, if the police had protected the Chinese from "the wicked little street gamins" when they wished to make their procession in the street instead of their Joss house.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

The Two Theisms.

BY PROFESSOR F. W. NEWMAN.

Those who are contending for free thought in religion are contending for a noble prize, and are temporarily united, while that prize is withheld from the public by a powerful adversary. But the moment they commence to use their freedom, the same thing happens, and must happen, now as always heretofore. Human infirmity clings to all. Each is finite, and sees but partially; hence their judgments are often in opposition. The contrasts of opinion in Greek philosophy, when there was no organized priesthood to forbid or to cripple freedom of thought, were as extreme as now.

Some imagine that, because the schools of material science work on in harmony, and the conflicts of opinion rather assist progress, being but partial and temporary, so will it be in religion, as soon as we resolve to cultivate religious thought scientifically. This might be the case, if materialism were the basis, or if we had foundations recognized by all. But in metaphysics, and in mental science generally, the great discouragement of study has lain in the irreconcilable and fundamental variance of the professors. Materialism and Spiritualism fight together for possession of the schools of morals and of psychology; so also of necessity will they in religion. Those who wish to be scientific are not agreed as to the bases and procedure of the new (religious) science, for which they are hoping in common. Every science has to work out its own problems in its own way. Strong analogies and harmonies are detected between the several sciences after they arise and live; nevertheless each is born independently, and acts independently; nor can any endure dictation from without, though hints and suggestions may be welcome and profitable. Thus, after we have agreed that free thought is necessary in religion, and that a scientific religion is the thing to be desired, we may easily remain as far apart in religious opinion and belief as were stoics and epicureans; or if our difference be less extreme, it may be rather from holding more negations in common than from agreement in affirmation.

Nor, when people profess to believe in God and call themselves Theists, does this go far to indicate real agreement. The question recurs, What do we mean by God? If we may not give a reply, the word is unmeaning to us, and we deceive ourselves in thinking that we have any belief at all. But as soon as we give a reply,—not as believing that it can exhaust the whole reality, but merely that it may explain our thought,—some one arises to reprove us for presumption in supposing that we can limit the illimitable, and define the incomprehensible. Men who by general suffrage are eminent in some physical science think forthwith that their physical attainments justify their laying down the law in religion; and we who have broken loose from the dogmatism of the churches find that we have to encounter a new fight for our freedom against the dogmatism of this or that "man of science," who perhaps graciously allows us the field of "the Unknowable" for religion, or not even that; for it is well if the new dogmatist will let us have any belief in a Superior Spirit at all. Nothing is commoner than a shriek of derision against a "personal God." Under the groundless pretence that personality means limitation, or means Anthropomorphy, we are forbidden to believe in a God who has purposes and sentiments. A God without either purposes or sentiments is a God in whom we cannot recognize mind at all, and is therefore a blind force or a blind fate. A recent writer of great literary eminence, while fancying that he is about to deliver religion from sacerdotal metaphysics, emphatically denies, not the personality only, but even the unity of God; thus presenting us with nothing but a plurality of either forces or abstractions, and plunging us into an abyss of metaphysics still deeper—one also out of which no practical religion has ever yet emerged.

Setting aside avowed Atheism and avowed Pantheism (a very equivocal term), even in the apparently more limited form of belief denoted as Theism, there are at least two broadly distinguished schools of thought, between which, if we remain Theists, it is necessary to choose; and the more fully the two can be described and contrasted, the greater will be the aid to students of Free Religion. Indeed one might mark out a third school, the Deism of the eighteenth century. This portrayed the Creator as external to his creation, which they supposed him to have endowed with self-acting forces. Matter, in this theory, was either created or endowed with gravitation at a definite time, which may be called the crisis or era of creation; so that the action of God upon matter was convulsive and momentary; and the great forces of the universe, which he then bestowed on it, were regarded as no part of the divine essence, but as the properties of matter. To every planet he gave an "initial impulse," which prevents its falling into the sun; and then left the system to itself. Thus he may be said to have made a clock, wound up the spring, and pushed the pendulum into activity. Such apparently was the belief of the great Sir Isaac Newton. But in the nineteenth century this doctrine is almost universally disowned. The smallest acquaintance with the great science of geology convinces every one that the idea of creation as limited to a single crisis of time has no plausibility whatever; that creation is undoubtedly the work of continuous ages, enormous in duration, whatever its mode and progress; moreover, that, if God is to be recognized at all in the universe, the great forces which are therein detected by the mental eye are strictly divine forces, and that any distinction between initial impulses as divine and continued forces as not divine is groundless. This is the incipient reconciliation of Pantheism and Theism.

Nevertheless, our Theism divides itself into two schools, broadly separated, and for convenience it may be allowed to entitle them Greek Theism and Hebrew Theism. Of the former, the great Aristotle was probably a worthy representative; and it commends itself to a great majority of those who are forward to identify their faith with science. (I must leave our good editor to say for himself whether his doctrine is that which I entitle Greek Theism.) The cardinal point of this is that it supposes God to have nothing, in him or of him, but general Law. He may be described as Force acting everywhere according to Law, under the guidance of Mind. He is supposed to be so absorbed in general action as to remain quite unobservant of the detailed results, or at least unconcerned about them. Thus he intends this earth to have day and night, to have vegetation and various animals on it, moreover to have a human population. These generalities he is not too great to design and devise. But, it is said, we cannot suppose him to pay attention to any particular man, without supposing him to attend to every sparrow, to every oyster, to every stalk of sea-weed, and this (it is thought) would be absurd. He wishes the human race, as a whole, to attain its own perfection, but it is thought puerile to suppose him to attend to each individual; and, as favoritism would be a human weakness, he has no love and no care for any individual. Conversely, then, it would be gratuitous, unseemly, perhaps impossible for any of us to love him. In accordance with this, Aristotle makes a passing remark—"for it would be ridiculous for any one to say that he loves Jupiter;" not, I apprehend, from his investing Jupiter with the colors of Greek mythology, but from his supposing no moral relations to exist between the Supreme God and us. Of course it will follow from that view that human injustice and vice, great as are their mischiefs, are offences against man or ourselves, not against God; hence the idea of "sin against God" cannot exist. God is not supposed to be concerned with the sin of an individual; to confess it to him would be an impertinence which Aristotle never seems to imagine possible. Indeed, the same great philosopher esteems intellectual virtue as higher than moral virtue, on the express ground that God cannot possess moral virtue, which belongs only to the natures which have passions to restrain and direct wisely; nor, indeed, is it intelligible to ascribe moral virtue to a Being who is wholly solitary, and has neither temptations to resist, nor duties to fulfil. But probably the modern Theists of this class will admit that, when a Superior Being gives sensitive life to other objects, he creates for himself relations to them and duty to them, especially the duty of justice not to create them for mere misery, or deal inequitably with them; and that two lines of imaginable conduct at once open, according to one of which God would show himself good, and according to the other evil. Hence the epithet good attached to God is not idle and unmeaning, but has a real sense. I do not know, but I hope, that those whom I entitle Greek Theists in the present day regard it as rightful and becoming to believe that God is good, even while contemplating either that violence of the elements which causes destruction and pain to myriads of his creatures, or the preying of one class of animals on another. That pain and death are strictly necessary, I suppose all thoughtful persons to understand.

But here a caution is needed, concerning the description of omnipotence,—a word which is often gravely misunderstood; insomuch that one may doubt whether it is wise to use it at all. If the word be strictly pressed, omnipotence makes wisdom needless, and leaves to it no functions. We cannot ascribe wisdom, without implying difficult problems to be solved; but to omnipotence there can be no difficulty at all, and no problem; a "fiat" suffices. Hence in calling God Wise, or All-Wise, we virtually assume that there are limits to his power, even if we know not exactly what. A second consideration shows that cases of apparent impotence in God may be mere inventions of human absurdity. It is a celebrated Greek saying that "the only thing which God cannot achieve is, to undo the past." This does but assert that divine power is out of place in solving the absurd problem of making contradictions simultaneously true; such as, "Alexander conquered Darius," a past fact, and, "Alexander did not conquer Darius," the past fact undone. Verbal contradictions belong to the puzzle of human thought, and are no problem for power. One who disputes this does not know what he is saying. Even dull minds will find themselves constrained to deny that God can create a God like to himself. To create the uncreated, is a contradiction. The distinction between the uncreated and the created is irreversible. We may advance from this to geometrical considerations. Archimedes discovered that a sphere is exactly two-thirds of its circumscribing cylinder. To bring about, by a divine fiat, that the ratio should be three-quarters would be to establish a contradiction. To deny that this falls within the sphere of power cannot shock piety. As well might one be shocked at the denial that a geometrical shape can be made simultaneously round and square. Further: mathematicians easily imagine a force of gravitation which shall obey a different law from that of Newton, and in following out the inferences find no self-contradiction. Yet it is more than possible that the Newtonian law is a rigid necessity of the physical system, and that to change it belongs not at all to the sphere of power, any more than to reverse geometrical or verbal truths. Nevertheless, it may justly be feared that some minds, who have credit for "philosophy," ill understand thoughts apparently so simple and obvious; since the late eminent John Stuart Mill deliberately committed himself to the declaration that in some other world than this, for aught he knew, two and two might make five! (So resolute was he to maintain, through thick and thin, that experience was the only test of knowledge.) But as soon as we understand that the great geometrical and physical laws of the universe are a condition under which Creating Power acts, we find abundant room for the profoundest wisdom. When we ascribe Almightiness, it is only a short phrase for saying that "we cannot know the limits of God's power in any of the problems in which power is applicable; and in dealing with them, we assume that there are no limits." But this belongs to our ignorance, not to our knowledge. The Homeric epithet Much-mighty may be preferred by a rigid philosophy to Almighty, in speaking of that which transcends knowledge.

The Theism which teaches that there is no definite moral relation between an individual man and his Divine Author, but only between the collective human race and its source; and that the relation is limited to this, that God by creating bound himself to be just to the race collectively,—such Theism does not encourage the individual to any acts of worship, and scarcely to the sentiment of gratitude. Compare the case of a land-owner who likes to have pheasants in his copses. Perhaps he takes some pains to keep away the animals which are destructive to them, and in so far causes the pheasants to increase and enjoy life. But if he does not care for any one of them, neither does he wish any of them to care for him. A Greek Theist was beset by uncertainty whether, if he paid thanks and worship to Jupiter, the god listened to him, or in any sense accepted his addresses; hence, with but few exceptions, we find no mark of moral contact between the Greek soul and the soul of the universe.

The prevalent tendency of Greek philosophy to that which Christians esteem to be pride and self-righteousness is perhaps to be ascribed to this cause. Man stood erect in the presence of man, with whom alone he recognized moral relations, and was not awed and abashed by contrasting his own moral imperfection with the essential holiness of God. Mr. F. E. Abbot probably extols this position of the Greek mind as manliness; for in his Impeachment of Christianity, he has attacked the modern religion vehemently on this ground. He says: "It strikes a deadly blow at the dignity of human nature, and smites men with the leprosy of self-contempt." But the phenomenon was older than Christianity.

I turn to the Hebrew Theism. It recognizes all in God which I have described as Greek Theism, but adds something more, and that of prime importance. It does not suppose that he is absorbed, and as it were exhausted, in general action, but believes that he takes cognizance of individuals also. When Euripides denies that Jupiter attends to the sins of individual men, he argues, as Epicurus after him, that it would give the god too much trouble. [Melanippe Desmotis.] "If Jupiter were to write down the sins of mortals, the whole heaven would not suffice, nor would he himself suffice, to look into each case and send its penalty." Thus the reluctance of the opposite school to admit that the Most High attends to details really turns upon an ascription of feebleness to him. The Hebrew Theist maintains that the universal agency of the Divine Spirit is a FACT; and that the division of his innumerable acts into two classes, those which we can refer to a definable law and those in which no general law is discernible by us, is a division made to aid our finite minds. Again, no one regards it as partiality and "favoritism" in the rays of the sun, that they act differently on chemical material differently prepared; nor does it imply "mutability" in God (as objectors tell us), if he act differently on different human souls, according to their state. Hence there is no just a priori objection to hinder and reprove that INSTINCT of the heart which casts itself on God in spiritual prayer; nor is it superstitious to believe that he will strengthen our virtue when we flee to him for aid.

To the Hebrew Theist, God is emphatically "a God who searches the heart." He is regarded as dwelling in its recesses, and having (what can only be called) a joint-consciousness with the individual man. The worship is prevalently internal and unspoken, however pleasant the sympathetic enthusiasm of common worship when hearts are in unison. In creatures so imperfect as we, and especially in the novitiate of heart-religion, no small part of secret prayer will be, either petition for more strength to fulfil duty, or expression of grief for failures. An axiom of the religion is that God desires from us inward and outward goodness, holiness, and righteousness; hence any wilful neglect, any choice of the baser part instead of the better, is accounted not merely to be unjust or vicious, but also to be sin against God. I am aware that in the present day men calling themselves Christians have pronounced "sin against God" to be an absurd idea, and allege that one who asks "forgiveness" supposes God to nourish "unseemly resentment." Such objectors think themselves Christians, and are not; nor is the objection just. The longer any one has cultivated religion as an inward life,—the more frequent and more solemn has been his self-dedication before the Divine Spirit to all that is holiest and best,—so much the more certain is he to feel that any wilful deviation is an offence, not only against his own soul or (it may be) against a fellow-mortal, but also against God. If the worshipper on any day have a bad conscience, a cloud seems to hide the serene and glorious presence. If then a keen grief seize him, what matters it whether he use this phrase or that phrase, in seeking to recover his lost ground? A child conscious of wrong asks "pardon" of his father, and does not hereby impute "unseemly resentment;" but he knows he is disapproved, and he desires to remove disapprobation, which is to happen through a change in himself, of course, but he is not just then at leisure to study words accurately, and it may be he blames himself extravagantly. "We know not what we should ask for as we ought, but he that searcheth hearts knoweth what is the mind of the spirit," says Paul excellently. Such strivings are not ineffectual, but eminently conduce to moral culture and vital power, however much they may be reproved or disdained by the unsympathizing logician, who perhaps has no personal experience in the matter. Alike pointless is the sarcasm that it is hoped by prayer to "alter the purposes and modify the action" of God; and that prayer "asks him to work a miracle." Whatever the weight of this against prayer for things external, it has no application at all to that prayer which concerns the heart of the worshipper only. There is no reason why we should not hope that God will act differently on souls that pray and on souls that do not pray; and wide experience reports that he does so. Thus also a definite moral relation is recognized between the Divine Spirit and the soul which seeks his intimate influence; and (however it may be regretted or reproved as sectarianism) the sense inevitably springs up that there is in the human race an interior circle of SAINTS or "people of God;" insomuch that without being able strictly to justify every phrase, still this ancient outpouring of desire sounds as melody to the heart: "Blessed are they that keep judgment, and he that doeth righteousness at all times. Remember me, O Lord, with the favor that thou bearest unto thy people. O visit me with thy salvation; that I may see the good of thy chosen, and rejoice with thine inheritance."

As two seeds, in aspect alike, grow up into different trees, so the fundamental difference of Hebrew from Greek Theism, on a superficial view small, entails vast moral results. With the Hebrew Theist religion is a signal aid to morality; with the Greek Theist it is no aid at all. Duty is everywhere easier to know than to practise. It is an old complaint, "I see and approve the better, but I follow the worse." A Greek Theist may be an eminently good man, but no thanks to his religion; for when he encounters temptation it adds no strength to him. He does not believe that God looks on and approves or disapproves his conduct. But the Hebrew Theist, if he live in the spirit of his religion, lives under the thought, "Thou, God, seest me;" and it is harder to go wrong under the eye of a virtuous friend, though it were but a man. His religion is emotional, and adds a vital force to morality.

Again: if any one believe God to love his creatures, no impediment exists in the inequality of natures to loving him in return. I know that modern "Greek Theists" echo Aristotle's incredulity, and call "love for Jupiter" a delusion. Yet undoubtedly we love, for their essential goodness, persons whom we have never seen, though they may not know of our existence; certainly then, if we believe that God knows us, and loves us, and every way deserves love, it ought not to be treated as beyond nature to love him. A prominent and applicable test of love is pleasure in any one's company,—that is, pleasure in a sense of his presence. Though we judge God to be alway with us, yet human society or needful absorption of mind in business and duty very largely preoccupies us; but if at every vacant interval the heart springs back with delight to the remembrance that God is present, such a heart may surely be said to love God. Joy in a sense of his nearness is attested by a long series of votaries in the Hebrew school, which has propagated itself into Christendom and Islâm. Well-known Hebrew Psalms, to which countless hearts have thrilled and echoed, proclaim the blessedness of "seeing God's face" (a strong metaphor) and living under the light of his countenance. As the hart pants for the water-brooks, so pants the "saint" for a sense of his presence, whose loving kindness is better than life, whose approval brings fulness of joy.

Thus while Greek Theism is to the individual a mere theory of the intellect, and possibly a science, Hebrew Theism must be something else beside science; namely, a life, dwelling in head and heart alike. It attributes to God perfect goodness, perfect holiness; words varying in sense with different minds, yet in all suggesting something high above what the individual has attained. Hence, in spite of dull imagination, low morals, and a necessarily mutilated appreciation of what God really is, the votary in this religion holds up to his heart for worship an object far nobler and purer than himself. If I refer to the poetical tale of Job, who, on getting a mental sight of God, cried out: "Behold, I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes," I may justly be told that this is mythological. However, the prophet called Isaiah in our Bibles said in his own name, "We are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousness is but filthy rags;" words strangely treated as a doctrine special to Christians, and tending to undervalue practical righteousness! On the contrary, they are the vehement aspiration of the heart for a higher goodness than its own,—a heart utterly disparaging its own attainment in comparison to that which it sees above it, and longs for. But I suppose it will be added, "If such self-contempt is real, it is debasing; it saps the dignity of man." Yet it is not visible that Luther, or John Knox, or Oliver Cromwell were deficient in manliness, if even they "crawled on the ground" under a sense of their own vileness, contrasted to God's purity. I fully admit to Mr. Abbot that the inward religion common to Jew and Christian may become morbid; namely, by assuming an intensity of grief which (in a weak nature) endangers moral despair. The ups and downs of a much-tempted, much-sinning man, often bitterly repenting, often jubilant with delight,—whose sins perhaps (like those of the poet Cowper) are unknown to all but himself and hardly believed by others,—may entail a mental malady like Cowper's; or, in a more robust and carnal nature, may drive a man into hardened courses. I wish Mr. Abbot to understand that I see this danger. Nevertheless as fire may burn us, and could not be the great aid to us that it is if this were impossible, so judge I of that mental contact between the impure soul and its far purer object of worship. The humiliation thus induced forbids a man to despise even the most sinful and polluted of his race; makes him tender-hearted and forgiving, preparing him to believe that there is a fertile seed of goodness in those who have plenty of visible imperfection. I strongly deny that such humiliation tends to unmanliness, or lessens human dignity. The vehemence of passion uses strong language,—as in love, so in devotion. The "self-abhorrence," which is reproved as debasing, is felt only in the contrast of our darkness to God's purity, and has nothing to do with the comparison of man with man. To "crawl" before man is a loss of dignity, but before God we have no dignity to claim. Surely humility towards God must make us more amiable to man. "To do justly and love mercy" are in sweet concord with "walking humbly with God."

If there is any truth in what I have here laid out, a not unimportant inference seems to follow. A Hebrew Theist (such as I have described), though he believe neither in Moses nor in Jesus, finds true co-religionists in pious Jews and pious Christians; and not in those only who recognize him as "one of their invisible church," but in many who shun him and shudder at him,—many whose religion is disfigured by puerile or pernicious error. On the other hand, he may regard a Greek Theist as a good man, a noble man, a man to be esteemed; but he does not find in him a co-religionist; nay, rather regards him as "unregenerate" and needing "conversion." So, too, the Greek Theist evidently finds nothing in a respectable Atheist, however hard and scornful, to repel him. The difference between the two is one of intellectual speculation, and does not at all touch the heart. Thus, I incline to believe, the chasm which separates Theists who do not pray and Theists who pray is the broadest of all dividing lines. Those on this side are co-religionists with Jews, Brahmins, Christians, and Mussulmen; those on the other side are co-religionists with Pantheists (?) and Atheists. Perhaps it is for this reason that I feel so keenly the endless scoffs of THE INDEX against Christians of every class, just as if they struck myself. Scoffs and unintermitted small carping seem to me below the dignity of science, even when substantially just. But the use of such weapons belongs to men who suppose that religion is matter of the intellect only. When truth and error are mingled in great complexity, and have laid firm hold of the affections, error certainly cannot be extirpated by logical slaps in the face. On the contrary, intense aversion is excited, walls of separation are built up, prejudice is confirmed. Those whose religion is no mere dry light, but has emotion in it, cannot be beneficially accosted by a contemptuous, unsympathizing censor. But these few words are a mere corollary to the main topic of this article.

[We venture to add to the above most instructive and beautiful essay that the scientific Theism we believe in is neither exclusively Greek nor exclusively Hebrew, but, while absorbing all the truth of each, embraces also truth not contained in either; and that we are unaffectedly sorry that THE INDEX, whether justly or unjustly, should present itself in such a light to a man like Professor Newman. We certainly do not think that it has been understood.—ED.]

THE INDEX quotes a mercantile friend who objects to the inscription "In God we trust" on our coins, because it is a falsehood. He says that, if it read "The God we trust," it would be nearer the truth. These tactics are not new. It is an old device of the enemy to disparage the truth and value of all religious professions, as a means to their abolition. Administer the oath with utter disregard of its solemnity; then show that few men regard it; then abolish it. Make prayers in Congress a seeming mockery through the irreverent inattention of the members; then discontinue them. Ridicule a seemly expression of the nation's trust in God as hypocrisy; then erase it. We maintain that legend to be a true expression of the national sentiment,—a sentiment which needs, however, to be deepened and strengthened. To do so is the aim of our movement. To abolish alike the thought and its expression from our national life is the aim of THE INDEX. Nothing can be more helpful to our cause than a fair statement of the issue.—Christian Statesman.

THE NATIONAL CONVENTION.

CONTINUATION OF THE PROCEEDINGS AT THE GOD-IN-THE-CONSTITUTION CONVENTION — DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES—ADDRESSES ON THE SUBJECTS SUGGESTED THEREBY—LARGE ATTENDANCE AT ALL THE SESSIONS—THE CONCLUDING EXERCISES LAST NIGHT.

Yesterday the National Convention of those favoring a religious Amendment to the Constitution, concluded its sessions at Library Hall. The meetings were held during the day, at all of which there was a large attendance and a decided enthusiasm on the subject as presented to the audience. There is scarcely a doubt that the cause for which such strenuous efforts are being put forth has gained ground in this community through the medium of the Convention.

The morning session commenced at about a quarter to ten o'clock, the Convention being called to order by the President. Prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. Corey. While waiting a report from the Committee on Resolutions an address was made by Prof. George, who spoke for the people of Ohio, that they were alive on the question of the Religious Amendment, and were gaining converts steadily. Concluding, he called up Rev. Mr. Kalb, of Bellefontaine, to relate his experiences.

ONE WHO BELIEVES IN PATIENCE.

This gentleman thought patience should be exercised with the people, and with the clergymen. People were slow to be converted to this cause, but this should not discourage us. The speaker had at first thought the question an unimportant one, but he had been converted when he read the second Psalm. The speaker closed with an eloquent appeal for the Amendment.

On motion of Rev. D. McAllister, Revs. Osmond, McFarland, Brown, and Hill were added to the Committee on Petitions, and Henry Martin, Esq., Daniel Wilson, Rev. C. D. Trumbull, Rev. John Edgar, and Rev. T. A. Sproul were appointed a Finance Committee. Rev. J. G. McAlyeal was next introduced, and spoke for some time, making no new points, but satisfying the audience of his heartiness in the work.

THE DECLARATION OF RIGHTS.

The Chairman of the Committee on Resolutions then reported first a Declaration of Rights as follows:—

The friends of National Reform, in general Convention assembled, do hereby make the following declaration of their position, principles, and objects, and cordially invite the cooperation of all who accept in whole or in part the views herein set forth:—

1. This country was settled and its institutions founded by those who believe in God, and accept His word as the law of their lives, and this, their religious faith, was not an external feature, engrafted on their political existence, but an original, fundamental, and essential element of it, manifesting itself in their criminal code, as well as their recognition of God's sovereignty and their subjection in the colonial charters, the Declaration of Independence, the early State Constitutions, and other official acts and documents. These Christian features of our American civilization and national life were indispensable forces for the restraint of vice, the development of virtue, and the edification of the people; and we desire to maintain and perpetuate the same, believing that every effort for their obliteration tends directly towards social disorganization.

2. Whether recognized or not, the eternal truth remains that Jesus Christ is the ruler of the nations of the earth, and will hold them as nations responsible for their doings; and in the future, as in the past, will overthrow those who are guilty of wickedness, and establish and prosper those that obey him; and in remembering how in various forms this reverence for God has marked the civil life of this nation, we most profoundly regret that the Constitution of the United States, which is our fundamental law, contains no explicit recognition of God's sovereignty, or of this law as the standard of morality; and we declare our purpose by every legitimate means to seek its amendment in this regard, and now inscribe on our banner, God's law the nation's guide.

3. Such an Amendment is of high importance in view of the overshadowing influence of a written Constitution in moulding the morals and laws of the people. All experience shows that the two cannot remain permanently separated. If we as a nation do not, therefore, bring up the Constitution in this respect to the level of the moral sentiment of the people, it will surely bring the people down to its condition of ignoring and disregarding God.

4. In seeking this Amendment we are laboring for these most practical results, namely: the perpetuation of the Sabbath; the proper regard for an oath; the integrity and purity of the marriage relation; the retention of the Bible in the schools; the suppression of intemperance; the enforcement of law, and the maintenance of all the other Christian features of our civilization, without the humanizing and enlightening influences of which men's progress must cease, and the continuance of free government become impossible.

5. The adoption of such an Amendment to the Constitution would bring no more union of Church and State in the future than there has been in the past; but, as by Amendment number one, we are effectually guarded from all danger of such a union, we seek by this to guard against the equal peril of the practical adoption by the State of Atheism as its national religion, by which virtue shall be fettered, and vice turned loose; and, further, we declare our readiness to accept, either a modification of the Preamble or an additional Amendment, in any form of words that shall secure effectually the end sought for; but rejoicing in the success of the past, and pressed by the demands of the present, in the spreading of political corruption, we hereby pledge ourselves to each other, to the nation, and to God, to look on with unflagging patience and determined perseverance until it is written in the fundamental law of this nation, that the Bible is its standard of morality and the Jehovah its God.

THE RESOLUTIONS THEN READ.

At the conclusion of the reading of the declaration of rights, which was received with much applause, the resolutions were presented and read. Their consideration was postponed until the afternoon session, when, as will be noted below, certain changes were made. The following are the resolutions as finally adopted:—

1. Resolved, That in the unexampled progress of the cause of the National Christian Association during the past year, in the gathering of this large and enthusiastic assembly from all parts of the country, and in the words of cheer received from influential friends, representing our educational institutions, the army of the United States, and the secular press, we have reason for profound gratitude to Almighty God, and encouragement to prosecute the aims of the Association with renewed vigor.

2. That our cause is vital not only to the religious, but also to the moral and intellectual interests of our country; and that not Christianity alone, but patriotism as well, prompt to energetic and persevering efforts to achieve its ultimate triumph.

3. That in the omission of an explicit recognition of Almighty God and the supremacy of his law for the Constitution of the United States we recognize one of the frightful sources of the wide-spread and now increasing demoralization of our national life as seen in frequent and flagrant instances of official corruption, in the declination of commercial honor and honesty, the relaxation of the social ties of family, in the prevalence of social vices, crimes of violence, and in the rising spirit of carelessness.

4. That while we would not underrate or despise the number and power of our enemies, we feel unfaltering confidence in the final and complete triumph of our principles, believing them to be inseparably connected with the prosperity and perpetuity of the nation.

5. That we appeal with confidence to the friends who, by their prayers, labors and contributions, have sustained this movement in the past, to continue and increase their exertions in its behalf, assured that the reward of those exertions will be as great as the cause in which they are spent is glorious.

DISCUSSION OF THE DECLARATION.

The question of adopting the Declaration of Rights then came up, and several addresses were made upon its provisions, but it was finally unanimously adopted.

Additional vice-presidents were announced, after which the Executive Committee reported, an abstract of which will be found in the report of the afternoon session, when it came up for discussion.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

There was again a large attendance when the proceedings began at two o'clock. The President called the Convention to order, after which prayer was offered by the Rev. Dr. Hall, of Blairsville.

The following gentlemen were added to the Finance Committee: David Boyd, Esq., Rev. D. W. Collins, and J. McCracken.

The resolutions offered at the morning session were then again read, and the Convention proceeded to act upon them. On motion they were considered seriatim. The first two resolutions were promptly passed.

DISCUSSION ON THE RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. Glenn, of Illinois, thought the resolutions should be carefully considered before being adopted, as they would go out to the world and be carefully sifted. The third resolution says that nothing can save the country from the vortex of ruin but the name of God in the Constitution. He was not prepared to defend so wide an assertion; it implied that even God could not save the country. He was of the opinion that there might perhaps be several other things that might save the nation except this amendment.

Rev. Mr. Lytle, Chairman of the Committee, showed that the gentleman was mistaken in regard to the phraseology.

Rev. Mr. McAlyeal, of Iowa, said that it was the impression in his part of the country that all we want is simply to write the name of God in the Constitution. To meet this they take up Beecher's logic: "If you put the name of God in a cannon, will it shoot any straighter?" They do not understand or think of our national corruption and infidelity. If they understood that this infidelity was directly traceable to the omission of the name of God, the matter would be brought more directly to the human mind.

The third and fourth resolutions were then, on motion, referred back to the Committee for revision.

The fifth and sixth resolutions were passed after an humorous and rather brisk speech from President Hays.

REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Pending the revision of the two resolutions, the Executive Committee reported that the work had been prosecuted with increasing encouragement. The General Secretary had devoted his entire time to the work, as shown by his report. Twenty-eight thousand copies of the Christian Statesman, containing the report of last year's Convention, had been distributed. The receipts during the year, including the balance on hand at the beginning was $5,655.56, and expenditures $5,681.27. Pursuant to resolution of the last Convention, petitions to Congress have been circulated, and the work will be continued during the year. The report recommended ratification meetings by the delegates on their return, and a general circulation of petitions on the same general plan as last year. The report was received.

THE REPORT OF THE SECRETARY.

The Secretary of the Association then read his Report substantially as follows:—

After showing the points toward which the efforts of the Association had been directed during the year, the report says:—

"The principal assaults within the year upon the Christian element of our political organization have been in the decision by the Supreme Court of Ohio, reversing the decision of the Supreme Court of Cincinnati, and sustaining the expulsion of the Bible from the schools; and the attempts to overthrow Sabbath law and order in New York, Chicago, St. Louis, and other smaller cities and towns. In all these assaults aid has been afforded, directly and indirectly, by the Association and its members. With the constantly renewed and organized efforts of the so-called 'Liberals,' this part of our work becomes every year more important."

The report then speaks of the movement to have petitions signed, and gives statistics relative to the distribution of papers and documents, and continues:—

"Of public meetings, so far as can be ascertained, some four hundred have been held. Many of them have been under the auspices of auxiliary societies, nearly one hundred of which are now organized, with a total membership of well up to ten thousand. This is but a small proportion of the friends of the movement, as the work of organization has not been pressed forward. It is proposed to publish at as early a day as possible a full list of auxiliary associations, with names of officers and the number of members.

"Many of the meetings and discussions since the last National Convention have been of rare interest and importance. It is fitting also to mention here the conspicuous place which the question of the relation of our Constitution and Government to Christianity, and the Religious Amendment, held in the general conference of the Evangelical Alliance. The influence of that discussion was even more widely and powerfully felt, perhaps, in favor of our cause, than one of our own National Conventions. The noble utterances of our President and Corresponding Secretary, when others were silent, on behalf of our Christian institutions, illustrates the significant fact that when the connection between our Government and Christianity is ignored or condemned, the justification and maintenance of that connection devolves mainly, if not entirely, upon the Religious Amendment Association."

The report concludes as follows:—

"The year has numbered a larger array of accessions to our ranks than any two or three, or perhaps five, preceding years. Not only have numerous influential men joined the gathering hosts, but many heretofore opposed have come over to our side. Language like that found in some of the letters read yesterday is becoming common: 'The only time I doubted the propriety of this movement was before I looked into it.' 'I confess I have cherished hostility or doubts, but now I give my voice and hand with yours.'

"In closing let me suggest to the members of the Convention the importance of reporting the proceedings in religious weeklies and local papers. No better service can be done for the cause. In every community a ratification meeting should be held, and the work of organizing auxiliary associations and securing signatures to petitions energetically promoted.

"Respectfully submitted, D. MCALLISTER."

THAT BLUSH OF SHAME.

After reading the report, Dr. McAllister took occasion, Dr. Keiffer being in the chair, to commend Mr. Brunot for his utterance in the Evangelical Alliance, at its late session in New York, that he blushed for his country. The remarks were received with much applause, which was renewed as Mr. Brunot appeared. The latter gentleman was obliged to speak, but said but a few words. Dr. McAllister then announced that a subscription would be taken up, and that $1,677.75 had already been sent in. While the Financiers were circulating about the hall, the Committee on Resolutions returned, reporting that they had agreed to strike out entirely the fourth resolution, and had considerably modified the third. Before action was taken the meeting was addressed by Rev. Mr. Core, and afterward by Rev. J. W. Sloane, who was called to make an explanation of some matters of which President Hays had spoken. His words were received with much laughter and applause, which compelled him to proceed with more general remarks, during which, in speaking of the pitiful corruption of the country, he made the statement that the Ohio Committee had examined into the matter, and that there was not a county officer in the State of Ohio who was not a defaulter. From the applause that followed it seemed to be a very satisfactory state of affairs to the audience, most of the delegates being very much tickled at the idea that their "infidel enemies" were in such a bad way.

FINAL PASSAGE OF THE RESOLUTIONS.

The resolutions as a whole were then passed.

The Committee on Petitions reported that so far as could be told, the names of 54,228 persons had been affixed to the documents, and recommended that the papers be put in the hands of the Executive Committee.

This brought out Dr. McAllister, who gave some idea of the plan which it had been determined upon to adopt to carry on the work. There would probably not be a Convention next year, but instead several local ones in different parts of the country; perhaps one in Boston, one in Baltimore, one in Chicago, one in St. Louis, one on the Pacific slope, and one in the Southeast, North or South Carolina. At these, the petitions will be collected in time for presentation in 1876. At that time the speaker hoped there would be about two million signatures, which would be a power to accomplish what was desired.

Rev. Mr. Williamson then read a statement, showing how 4,000 names had been obtained to the petition in this city. Afterward there was quite a number of announcements, when the meeting adjourned until half-past seven o'clock.

THE EVENING SESSION.

The evening session convened at half-past seven o'clock, Rev. S. J. Nelson offering up prayer. Rev. H. H. George, of Cincinnati, read the report of the Enrollment Committee, as follows: Delegates, 641; non-certified delegates, 422. Total, 1,063. States represented, 18.

Rev. A. A. Hodge was then introduced, and before speaking, offered a few words of explanation. He was present by constraint from without, not from within. Until last Thanksgiving day he was supposed to be on the other side, but he would say that he was now heart and soul in the matter. He hoped this was clear, although his speech might be dark. His address was very able, and met with attentive consideration. Upon retiring he was heartily applauded.

A CONSTITUTIONAL DEFENDER.

The next speaker was T. Baird Patterson, Esq., who spoke for about half an hour. His address was argumentative in character, and was listened to with attention.

The Finance Committee then reported as follows: Cash subscriptions, $492.40; time subscriptions, $1,587.50; previously reported, $1,677.75; making a total of $3,759.65.

A SOLID SERMON FROM MR. SCOVEL.

Rev. Mr. Scovel was then introduced and made a very interesting address on the subject of "Independent Morals." He said the text of his moral sermon would be found in the eighth chapter of the New Gospel of Liberalism. The text read, "We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of moral laws shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be made to conform to the natural morality and impartiality of liberality." The gentleman said he thought the impartial liberality was the blazing tail of the comet, too thin to hurt anybody. Continuing he showed that the Demands of Liberalism were in effect, that temples which had been built should be torn down, and instead of building upon a foundation of Christ, to take something that the liberals consider better—that is, natural morality. The speaker then examined into the comparison of the two laws, of Christ's teachings and the new-fledged liberal reformers. He defined natural morality to be that which man had produced, throwing aside revelation. In illustration of this he showed how, through the history of nations, where morality ruled, there was an outgrowth of usury, disregard of the Sabbath, revenge, and that its men are led to the justification of suicide because by it a man's life was for this world only. Idolatry was a natural result of natural morality. It taught adultery, infanticide, and other crimes, many of which were detailed.

It was under this law of morality that the strongest objectors of the Amendment took their stand. Would Christian people acknowledge this law?

THE INDIVIDUAL LIFE OF NATIONS.

The President next introduced President George P. Hays, saying the card which he held called him Hon. George P. Hays, D.D. He supposed it was all right. Mr. Hays on appearing spoke as follows:—

The speaker began by saying that in the effort to anchor the nation to fundamental truth on the subject of morality it is often asked would it not be better to address yourself to the people? The speaker thought the nation was no other than the people, and illustrated the point by reference to the plan of organizing a bank corporation. He said it was the experience of governments that it was of vital importance that corporations should be bound by stock negotiations. In the late Constitutional Convention there was no subject of greater difficulty than that of corporations, and every effort was made to control and restrain them by provisions so explicit that they could not be avoided. The very same Convention found a like difficulty in laying down regulations for the government of the State itself. The State is only a public corporation, as the bank is a private one, and the call for a Convention to amend the Constitution came from the people, not so much because they felt that the new regulations were needed for the private corporations, as that they felt that the old Constitution did not properly regulate the duties of the State itself. By explicit declaration, by oaths and penalties, that Convention sought to enforce it on the minds and bind it to the consciences of future officers that they were to do right. Would it have been out of place for them to have said, The Bible is for this State the standard of morality, and on all subjects concerning which the State takes action it is to be the guide?

What makes this subject of such deep personal importance to all of us, is the fact, that the State is what might be called a necessary corporation. By our birth we become part of it, under its protection, and subject to its punishments. We cannot get out of it. If we leave the United States, we go to some other country, and are part of society, and under law there; our only escape is to flee to some Robinson Crusoe island, and be sure that no man Friday ever comes on it with us, for if he does it is certain that either we will be his master, or he ours, and both master and slave accountable to God for our use of our power. If it is important that these optional corporations, like banks, and such like, should be under proper charter regulations, when men can leave them if they wish, how much more important is it that these necessary corporations, like the State and the family, should be held fast to the eternal morals of God. Over the private corporations there is the State, and over the State is the nation, to see that it does not transgress the proper boundaries of its duty. But who is over the nation but God?

The speaker then said the place to put such a clause anchoring the nation to the truth was in the Constitution. There were three parts to the Constitution, the salutary, the affirmatory, and the prohibitory. The principal argument was based upon the latter. As the Constitution prohibits established religion, all the hue and cry about Church and State is mere insulted truth. What was proposed was, that while existing sections guard from this perilous extreme, the new Amendment would equally guard from atheism, secularism, and the utter wreck of fundamental merits. It was said that to avoid extremes let the whole subject alone. The speaker thought neutrality would not avoid it, and proved his point by able illustrations of the tariff laws. Continuing, he said:—

"We are often asked, Why do you not go to the people? Can an amendment of the Constitution make the people moral? If I understand the matter, that is just what we have been doing—'going to the people.' This Convention was called as a step in getting at the people, and if my eyes do not deceive me, we have got at a multitude of people. Since this movement was first organized, at a little meeting of few people at Xenia, Ohio, in 1863, it has had marvellous success with the people. Politicians are very timid of us now. They will grow wise soon. Society in this country, politically considered, is very much like a pyramid, very broad at the base, and very small at the top. At the base, and for more than half its altitude, are the quiet, thoughtful people with no ambition for office, and contented no matter who is elected, so all goes on well. Above them is the drifting populations who are shaken with every wind, and quiver like a jelly-cone on a wedding-table, while above them on the apex ride the politicians. To ride there with safety is no small feat of dexterity, and, as a rule, it is most important to the rider to keep those shaky people who will scratch their ticket for a drink of whiskey, in as good a humor as possible. But where are they when the foundations move? Those foundation masses set themselves on the salary question, and reluctant obstinacy had to yield. It is to that class that this appeal is made, and by them it is best received; and when once they are moved, hundreds of politicians, who would not for the world commit themselves to it now, will brawl themselves hoarse in applause, and swear they knew it would be so, and were on that side from the beginning. Patience and perseverance, friends of our cause! These great Pharisaic masses that bear up this country are settling their repose on the Rock of Ages, and the generations of the nations of the future shall build after the same example."

THE OFFICERS FOR THE YEAR.

After Mr. Hays had concluded, the committee on officers for the coming year presented the following report:—

President—Felix R. Brunot.

Vice-Presidents—The Hon. James M. Harvey, United States Senate; His Excellency, Robert W. Furnas, Governor of Nebraska; the Hon. Lorenzo Sawyer, United States Circuit Court, San Francisco, Cal.; the Hon. G. S. Brooks, United States District Court, North Carolina; the Hon. Edgar W. Hillyer, United States District Court of Nevada; the Hon. B. F. Safford, Supreme Court of Alabama; the Hon. C. C. Cole, LL.D., Supreme Court of Iowa; the Hon. Charles Elliott, D.D., Presbyterian Seminary of Northwest, Chicago, Ill.; Prof. E. Kirby Smith, University of Nashville, Tenn.; the Rev. George B. Cheever, D.D., Eaglewood, N. J.; Prof. W. Henry Green, D.D., LL.D., Princeton Theological Seminary, New Jersey; the Rev. William R. Nicholas, D.D., Newark, N. J.; and seventy-five others.

General Secretary—Rev. D. McAllister, 410 West Forty-third Street, New York.

Corresponding Secretary—Rev. T. P. Stevenson, 104 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia.

Recording Secretary—Rev. W. W. Barr, Philadelphia.

Treasurer—Samuel Agnew, Esq., 1126 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

Executive Committee—Secretaries and Treasurer of the Association, ex-officio: R. B. Sterling, Joshua Cowpland, James S. Martin, Rev. S. O. Wylie, D.D., Robert Taylor, Wm. McKnight, Thos. Walker, M. McConnell, Thos. Brown, John Alexander, Philadelphia, Pa.; Henry Harrison, Robert B. Maxwell, Wm. Neely, George Silver, James Spencer, Hugh Carlisle, David Houston, New York; Rev. Wm. Owens, Indiana, Pa.; D. Chesnut, Pittsburgh; Henry Martin, Cincinnati, O.

All of these were chosen, and after a few words from the President, thanking the Association for their choice of himself, the Convention adjourned sine die.—Pittsburgh Dispatch, Feb. 6.

THE TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

The State Legislative Committee on Just and Equal Taxation had a hearing, Thursday, concerning the exemption of church property from taxation. This question has for some time past been attracting general attention, and the hearing may be said to have ushered it into the field of politics, where it is more than likely to make some stir. We observe that, the religious and secular press having pretty well aired the question, ministerial clubs are now taking it up. The opinions entertained on the subject by clergymen are by no means all on one side. We had been prepared for this by the generally liberal and unbiased tone in which the matter has been treated by the religious press. The more liberal-minded, both of the clergy and religious journals, seem quite disposed to agree with the general verdict of the secular press, that the exemption of church property from its share of the public burden of taxation is altogether without justification, and we are by no means sure that the clergy would be generally found in opposition to legislation for the correction of the evil.

The argument which the apologists of exemption most rely on is, that the usefulness of the churches as coadjutors of Government in promoting the good conduct of citizens, entitles them to this privilege. If this is going to be regarded as a valid argument, we propose putting in a plea for the exemption of newspaper property from taxation on the same ground. Certainly, in these latter days, the pulpit will scarcely claim precedence of the press as an educator and director of the public conscience, and a supplementary police force of society. Its Argus eye is in every place, beholding the evil and the good, proclaiming the deeds of men upon the housetops, punishing the evil with obloquy, and rewarding the good with fame, and withal throwing in for nothing an amount of miscellaneous exhortation and good advice on all conceivable subjects that would in a single year furnish the pulpits of the world with inexhaustible stores of ammunition for all time, and this, too, not for one day in the week, but for six and often seven. We would not be understood as disparaging the usefulness of the ministry. Comparisons are odious, but once for all, What tongue of living teacher can compete, in the work of multiplying precept on precept, with a Hoe press?

Well, then, we think we have made good the claim of newspaper property to be exempted from taxation, if church property is to enjoy that privilege. But for our part, we hold that no class of property should be thus exempted, but that all alike should contribute to the cost of that civil security which all alike enjoy. Discrimination in this respect is always indefensible in principle, and, when made in favor of such an immense fund as the church property of this country, most oppressive in practice. Are we not ready to move for a reform?—Springfield, Mass., Union.

The question of repealing the law exempting church property from taxation has been brought up in the recent meetings of the Baptist and Congregational clergy in this city, and the differing views entertained have been expressed with considerable freedom. There are many millions of dollars invested in churches and church property in the State, which should be made to bear its equitable share of the general burden of taxation. The hearing at the State House, before the Committee on Just and Equal Taxation, disclosed the substantial grounds on which the present movement for repeal is based. The growth of this class of property has been so rapid, and the methods of diverting accumulated funds have so multiplied in consequence of the easy combination of secular and religious purposes, that the general taxpayer looks upon the fact as it presents itself to him in figures with genuine amazement. People appear to be reminded for the first time of the civil responsibilities which they have been content to assume in addition to their rightful ones, simply in obedience to a custom into which they have never thought to examine. There is clearly but one way to establish a plan of taxation that shall operate with undoubted justice in the interests of all, and that is to tax all kinds and classes of property alike, and to exempt none. Any other method justly breeds discontent. There can be no injustice in making those who own churches pay the taxes on them, and so with the owners of all sorts of church property. No exemption—taxation according to an uniform rule—is the true method for a republican people.—Boston Post, Feb. 13.

CAPTAIN MAXSE'S ADDRESS

TO THE ELECTORS OF THE TOWER HAMLETS.

[The following telling address, for copies of which we return our acknowledgments to Captain Maxse, has been issued in the form of small hand-bills for public distribution among the electors in what corresponds to one of our "Congressional Districts." Captain Maxse is one of the rising reformers of England, and is rapidly acquiring the influence to which he is justly entitled. His Causes of Social Revolt is one of the most instructive papers we ever read on social reform; and he has our heartiest wishes for success in his parliamentary canvass.—ED.]

GENTLEMEN:—

I beg to offer myself as a candidate for the parliamentary representation of the Tower Hamlets.

I desire to call your attention to the following facts, which concern you as voters.

PAUPERISM.

In England and Wales during the course of a single year

Above 2,000,000 Persons receive Parochial Relief.

EDUCATION.

Out of 2,000,000 children on the School Register, less than 9000 pass the sixth standard, or, in other words, receive the rudiments of education, and only 150,000 leave School able to read and write decently.

THE LAND SYSTEM.

With food increasing in price, towns shamefully crowded, and an exodus of agricultural laborers in the course of arrangement, there are, at a moderate estimate, in the United Kingdom,

10,000,000 Acres of Waste Fertile Land, and immense, almost uninhabited tracts lie in a state of semi-cultivation for want of capital and industry which our class-system of land-tenure effectually excludes. Under this system the industrious poor have been gradually superseded by the only class which can afford to waste good land, and now monopolizes it everywhere.

GOVERNMENT BY A MINORITY OF ELECTORS.

Under the present electoral system, 30,000 electors —in small boroughs—elect 44 members of Parliament; 546,000 electors—in large boroughs—elect 35 members of Parliament; therefore, 30,000 Electors govern 546,000 Electors.

Sixteen thousand electors in the Tower Hamlets return one member; sixteen thousand electors in various rural districts return thirty members. Such is the distribution of political power imposed upon the credulity of voters as the foundation of a National Assembly.

Furthermore, the cost of admission to Parliament ranges at from £1000 to £10,000; the system of registration seems expressly devised to disfranchise working men; and the lodger franchise is so complicated with forms and disqualifications that it is virtually inoperative.

All these humiliating facts are intimately connected. Pauperism, high rates, dear food, and huddled populations, are the result of bad education, bad land laws, and government by the minority. My politics are founded upon the conviction that it is within the province of Parliament to remedy the evils I have set forth. I shall, if returned as your member, advocate a truly national system of education; alteration of the land system, including the preservation and nationalization of the commons; and electoral reform, based upon equal representation, assimilated town and county franchise, preferential voting, and triennial Parliaments.

The present system of direct taxation presses unfairly upon precarious incomes, while the indirect taxation (by diminishing the value of wages) falls heavily upon the working classes. I am in favor of the readjustment of the former, so as to relieve small temporary incomes, and to permit the gradual abolition of taxes upon articles of consumption, commencing with the immediate repeal of the tea and sugar duties.

I do not come forward as a party candidate, except so far as party is founded upon principle. I am opposed to the Tories, because I perceive in them the active supporters of wrong and opposition, and it is their fixed policy to preserve the unjust principles which disturb society and alienate Ireland. I am with the Liberals so long as they promote a truly progressive policy; but when Liberalism degenerates, as official Liberalism has recently done, into Toryism, I claim the right to independent action.

DISCUSSING the effects of the panic upon workingmen, the Nation remarks:—

"The deplorable feature in the system of paying labor by wages is, undoubtedly, that it makes large bodies of persons, of all ages and sexes, dependent on the providence, and sagacity, and honesty of one or half a dozen. If a great manager or manufacturer or financier makes a mistake, or commits malfeasance in office, a thousand, or it may be ten thousand, persons are thrown out of employment at a week's notice, they do not know why and cannot find out, and, what is worst, this fate is constantly impending over them. No outward signs of prosperity offer them the slightest guaranty against it. Indeed, nearly all the great failures and resultant panics occur when the industrial world seems to be sailing on a flood-tide of successful production. Now, there is no question that this blind and helpless dependence on the conduct of others, with whom one's relations are solely commercial, is one of the most weakening and corrupting agencies to which human character can be exposed. The more a man has his fate in his own hands, the more of a man he is, and the great end and aim of "labor reform," and indeed the only end and aim worth much talk, is the committal to the working-classes, as far as is possible, of the management of their own affairs. Indeed, we hardly hesitate to say that it is only through coöperation—that is, the participation of every worker in the business cares, or, at all events, in the knowledge of the business conditions and responsibilities which surround and uphold his peculiar industry, that any real and permanent improvement in his condition is to be looked for. Saving is very well, as it is well to be prepared for inundations and plagues; but it is better still to understand what brings inundations and plagues about, or to share fully and freely in the work of preventing them, instead of sitting with folded hands and praying lips waiting for them. Of course, it is easy to point out the difficulties in the way of coöperation. It is quite true that it is largely a question of character; that if we cannot have improvement of character without coöperation, it must also be said that we cannot have coöperation without improvement of character. But it must be borne in mind that the sole ground we have for believing that there is anything but ruin in store for the human race is the assumption that the character of the great mass of mankind can be bettered. If this be not true, science as well as literature and art, is an idle pursuit, and the future of our civilization not worth thinking about. We cannot turn the whole working-class into 'scholars and gentlemen,' but we certainly ought to be able to facilitate the creation of relations between capital and skill of the working-class such as will give them a saving sense of the modes in which capital is created and used or wasted."

A QUESTION.

Whence cometh this restless yearning,
This fever of heart and brain,
This eager, unsatisfied longing,
That bringeth us only pain?

A memory of that country
Where our spirits had their birth?
Or is it a premonition
Of something better than earth?

And will our toilsome endeavor
And our weary craving cease,
When Death, o'er the tired sleeper,
Whispers the benison—"Peace"?

We close, with lingering kisses,
The eyelids cold of our dead;
But for weeping nor caressing
Have they any answer made.

Is Death, then, the only Healer
We mortals shall ever know?
If Life hath no other fulfilment,
How shall we have room to grow?

Nay, Heart, thy unquenchable longing
Itself a sweet answer gives,
That God, our Eternal Father,
In His boundless Universe lives!

We shall, in the coming future,
Hope's fullest fruition reach:
That blest, diviner perfection
We cannot put into speech.

A larger, completer being
Shall crown our wearisome quest:
But oh! for a word, through the silence,
Assuring our hearts of Rest!

GRACE MORVEN.

GLIMPSES.

Canon Kingsley went off in Tremont Temple last week, with a loud report next day in the morning papers.

Total number of signatures thus far to the "Congressional Petition," 3,725; total number of signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition," 7,272.

Another Liberal League has been formed,—this time in Minneapolis, Minnesota. The officers are as follows: President, J. B. Bassett; Vice-President, John Van der Horck; Secretary, Anton Grethen; Treasurer, Thomas Buel.

Signatures to the "Congressional Petition" since last week have been received as follows: From Mrs. I. Babbitt, Boston, 38 names; from E. F. Harttmann, Boston, 18; from John Galvin, South Boston, 4; from N. B. Guernsey, Royalton, N. Y., 30; from Rev. W. A. Cram, Westford, Mass., 14; from W. W. Howe, Ware, Mass., 33; from William Chestnut, Ossawattomie, Kansas, 36; from Julius Joselyn, Hanson, Mass., 51. Total for the week—224 names.

Signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition" against non-taxation of church property have been received since last week as follows: From David B. Morey, Malden, Mass., 70 names; from Julius Joselyn, Hanson, 53; from G. A. Taylor, Boston, 40; from John Galvin, South Boston, 19; from Mrs. M. H. Plunkett, Amesbury, 12; from Philo Temple, Deerfield, 39; from John M. Kinney, Wareham, 39; from W. W. Howe, Ware, 33; from Edward Prescott, Westfield, 14. Total for the week—319 names.

The lecture of the Rev. Charles Kingsley on "Westminster Abbey," delivered in Boston on February 17, was full of eloquent passages; but it was greatly marred by his drawling and whining mannerism. We never knew a more disagreeable instance of the "holy tone" of the professional clergyman. It was painful, moreover, to remember the "lost leader;" and the reminiscence kept us impassive when we might otherwise have been thrilled by the noble sentiments expressed. How much more than any word is the man behind it!

Mrs. Zina Fay Pierce was hissed, not for the expression of her opinions on suffrage, but for the statement that women did not earn the money on which they were taxed; which her audience seemed to consider a gross misrepresentation. The leaders of the movement did not countenance this expression, but applauded the mild and dignified rebuke given to it by the chairman of the committee. Mrs. Pierce received the most courteous treatment from all the speakers who followed her, though they pretty thoroughly demolished her arguments. E. D. C.

It is a public humiliation that the old homestead of Stephen S. Foster and Abby Kelly Foster should be sold at public auction for the non-payment of taxes, when the sole cause of the sale is the conscientious refusal of the owners to pay any taxes until the right of suffrage is equally conceded to both of them. Taxation, it is true, rests on protection; but protection means the protection of personal as well as property rights, and therefore "taxation without representation is tyranny." There is something shamefully wrong when such life-long servants of humanity are treated by the State as if they were criminals. If one woman demands her fair share of political power, the whole community is bound to respect the claim. Give women the right to vote.

THE TWO PRINCIPLES.

The two principles which we advocated on February 12, at the public hearing granted by the Joint Special Committee of the Massachusetts Legislature to the petitioners for "Just and Equal Taxation," were these:—

"1. That all property, real and personal, not belonging to the State, but belonging to the inhabitants of the State, shall be assessed annually at a just and equal rate, and be subject to taxation from and after May 1, 1874.

"2. That, if the General Court shall in their wisdom deem it just and expedient to relieve any class of property or persons from the burden of taxation, such relief shall be accorded in the form of direct appropriation, on petition of the parties desiring relief, or their representatives, and on exhibition by them of good and sufficient reason why the State should grant it."

By the adoption and observance of these principles, we urged, all protected property would be equitably taxed for the protection it received; while all charitable or other objects which the people were willing to aid would receive such aid in the form least liable to abuse. The State Constitution distinctly recognizes the true ground on which rests the right to tax, when it says [Part I., Article X.]: "Each individual of the society has a right to be protected by it in the enjoyment of his life, liberty, and property, according to standing laws. He is obliged, consequently, to contribute his share to the expense of this protection." Protection, and protection alone, is what taxes are justly levied to secure; and all property which receives it is bound to contribute its fair proportion of its cost. It may reasonably be questioned whether the State has any moral right to make appropriations for any object not essential to efficient protection of the people and their property; and the habit of making State grants even for purely charitable objects is a practice dubious alike in point of justice and expediency. The defence of appropriating public funds for educational purposes must rest on the necessity of public intelligence to the very existence of public order and safety; and the most sagacious thinkers vindicate the public school system on no other ground. But if the whole people are willing to be taxed for purely benevolent objects, then the appropriations should be direct and of known amount. If any class of institutions is worthy to be supported in whole or in part by the State, a general law might be annually enacted appropriating directly to such institutions the full amount of the taxes assessed upon them; which would secure all the practical benefit of the present exemption system, while securing publicity for the exact amount of the appropriations, and thus avoiding the worst evils of the exemption policy. Some of these evils may be thus enumerated:—

1. The creation of a class of privileged property which is raised above all obligation of contributing to the public treasury, as if it owed nothing to the State which protects it. This instituted denial of a universal obligation tends to weaken in the people the perception and sentiment of justice, on which all rational respect for law must be based. The right of the State to tax should be distinctly recognized, even if it chooses to assume voluntarily the burden of donating the tax back again.

2. The danger of fostering an overgrown ecclesiasticism, especially in the case of the Roman Catholic Church, which is accumulating property to an extent that threatens the public safety in the not distant future. When tax-exemption ends in the erection of cathedrals which, like that in Boston, cost over $3,000,000, the practice is shown to be as injurious as it is unnecessary.

3. The excessive amount of exemptions, which is becoming a terrible public burden. In Massachusetts the sum total of exempted property is, at a moderate estimate, about $50,000,000. Constant applications are made to the legislature by new corporations for charters which shall permit them to hold large amounts of property exempt from taxation. The evil must at least be checked; it is better to abolish it, and make a clean sweep of all exemptions whatever. The inequality with which the burden of taxation is now distributed threatens to grow greater and more onerous every year; and the only thorough cure for such an evil is to adopt now a principle defensible in itself and impartial in its operation.

4. The gross abuses of exemption, by which property not intended to be exempted nevertheless escapes taxation. For instance, the Second Methodist Church, of Boston, is valued by the assessors at $137,000,—$25,000 on the building, and $112,000 on the land. The land is wholly exempted, as are also three fifths of the value of the building, which is taxed only for $10,000. Yet the two stores under the church pay a rent of $3,200, and therefore represent a productive property of $32,000 at least. Disregarding the value of the land altogether, we have here a building taxed for less than one third of its taxable value, in consequence of the exemption policy. The Wesleyan Association building, next adjoining, is taxed by itself alone on $200,000; but although it is devoted to business purposes, the land it is built on, valued at $130,910, is not taxed at all. So of numerous other cases. The policy of exemption fosters all manner of frauds and swindles by the secrecy it permits; nobody takes the trouble to hunt up the facts and figures, and there is no safeguard against false returns. Is it likely that such abuses would elude detection, if the only exemption were by way of direct appropriation? Corruption loves the dark. Let in the daylight; it has a wonderfully conserving influence on public morals.

5. The radical injustice of exemption, which is the root of all the other evils. Nothing is sound and healthy, either in private or public concerns, which is unjust; and the injustice of compelling only a part of the property protected by the State to pay the expenses of protecting the whole, is becoming daily more and more evident to the people. The exemption of a thirty-fifth part of the wealth of the community from its equitable share of the general protection is a serious matter, when the inequality thus established increases the taxes of all non-exempted property by nearly three fourths of a million of dollars. The injustice is aggravated by the fact that the chief benefit of it accrues to institutions which are the most wealthy, and therefore least need such aid. Direct appropriations would doubtless be so made as to succor most the feeblest and neediest institutions; while the impropriety of appropriating any portion of the public funds to churches, and thereby directly establishing a State religion, would be immediately evident.

On the other hand, the advantages of substituting direct appropriations for tax-exemption would be numerous and great:—

1. The people would be kept informed of the precise extent to which aid is accorded to worthy institutions; and any unreasonable donations would be consequently prevented.

2. Public economy would be greatly promoted by the discontinuance of the aid now rendered to that portion of exempted property which is not justly entitled to such favors.

3. The secrecy which attends aid rendered in the form of exemption, and which affords a fatal facility for all species of corruption, would be done away; and the advantage taken of the exemption laws, by which the State is robbed of taxes never intended to be remitted, would become impossible.

4. No aid would be granted by the State except in cases where strong and cogent reasons for it could be brought forward. There would be great gain in obliging all favored institutions to show annually that the assistance asked for had been fairly earned by benefits actually conferred upon the community. An institution like the McLean Insane Asylum, in Somerville, which is stated to be exempted from taxation on the score of being a charitable institution, and yet charges high prices to all its patients, would probably be obliged to extend its services gratuitously to the poor, or else be deprived of the bonus it now receives from the State.

5. Various other advantages might be enumerated, but chief of all is the rectification of a great injustice. The following statistics, chiefly based on the report of Hon. Oliver Warner, Secretary of the Commonwealth, for 1873, will be found instructive:—

Total number of polls in Massachusetts.....	408,131
Total valuation of property, real and personal,	$1,763,429,990
Total tax on above valuation.....	25,153,399
Total amount exempted property (about).....	50,000,000
Total tax remitted on same, at $14.49 per $1000,	724,500
Average increase of tax per poll on account of exemption	1.77

That is to say, every poll in Massachusetts pays, on the average, $1.77 this year to make good the amount lost to the State by non-taxation of exempted property. Of this tax, $1.05 goes to make good the amount lost to the State by the non-taxation of "Meeting-houses" alone, according to the ratio established by the report of Deputy Tax Commissioner Gleason for 1870. Now by what right does the State tax every poll more than One Dollar a year for the support of the Church? Is it not a well-recognized principle of American government that no man shall be compelled to contribute to the support of any form of worship against his will? Is it not an outrage for the Church to steal one dollar, or one cent, out of the pocket of those who would not voluntarily contribute anything to her support? By the census of 1870, there were 1,764 church edifices in Massachusetts; and out of the $542,083 paid in that year by the community at large to make good the amount lost on exempted property, these 1,764 churches received over $322,000. Now, by the same census, the average value of each church edifice in Massachusetts in 1870 was only $9,115; and yet each levied that year a contribution from the whole community of $182, which is about two per cent. of its value. If the separation of Church and State is indeed a just and righteous principle, and if it is fundamental in the theory of our political institutions, then it is time that this practical establishment of the Church should cease, as a glaring violation of the religious rights of the people; and the abolition of church-exemption would be simply a due recognition of these rights.

Such are some of the evils of the exemption principle, and such are some of the advantages that would accrue from the principle of direct appropriation. It remains to touch briefly on the leading objections to the proposed general adoption of the latter principle.

1. "Religious and charitable institutions are unproductive property, yielding no pecuniary returns; therefore, they ought not to be taxed."

In the first place, this statement is not strictly true, since many of these institutions, as has been shown, are more or less productive, yet by an abuse of exemption are taxed far less than the degree of their productivity demands. But in the next place (and no further reply is needed), the State Constitution expressly recognizes, as already quoted, the principle that property is not taxed because it is productive, but because it is protected. If productivity is not the ground of taxation, then unproductivity is no ground for exemption.

2. "Churches should be exempted from taxation because they do so much good."

Waiving all inquiry into the amount of good they do, and conceding for argument's sake that they do good alone, it is nevertheless true that no amount of good done furnishes any just reason for exemption. If the principle is once accepted as valid that all property should be exempted which is used in doing good, what would be left to be taxed? All property does good which is used for good objects. Do not railroads do good? Do not newspapers do good? Does not every honest business do good? Take the case of Savings Banks,—an institution which may be justly compared with any other for the amount of good it does. The Massachusetts Commissioner of Savings Banks, Hon. F. M. Stone, shows in his report for 1872 that there were then in this State 172 Savings Banks, with an aggregate capital of $187,842,561, and 630,246 depositors. The average amount to the credit of each depositor was therefore $293. The increase in the number of depositors for the year was 69,045, and the average amount of savings by each was $82.-65. Now whoever appreciates this story of thrift and industry, of temptations to dissipation resisted, of frugality and all the domestic virtues fostered by it, will exclaim at once, "If churches are exempted from taxation for doing good, why not Savings Banks? Either exempt the banks or tax the churches!" Mr. Stone truly says that the Savings Banks "are of great public service in the aid furnished to all the industrial and social interests of the State." But they are taxed. Why, then, should the churches be exempt?

3. "But taxing the churches would be taxing benevolence. They are supported by donations given from philanthropic motives. It would be wrong to discourage such donations by taxing them."

Is it not clear enough that to extort a dollar a year out of every non-church-goer, in order to protect the churches from conflagrations, mobs, and so forth, is to throw the burden of protecting them chiefly on the numerous class who get none of their benefits? Those who make voluntary donations to the churches usually get their money's worth in the satisfaction of saving their own souls; but those whose dollar is annually extorted get no equivalent but the satisfaction of being made to pay for the preaching of doctrines they disbelieve in, contrary to every principle of our republican institutions. Not to tax the churches is to "tax benevolence;" for every dollar extorted from the unbeliever lessens his means for aiding such benevolent objects as he believes in. The bonus paid to the church-goer for exercising benevolence in one way is a disability imposed on the non-church-goer for exercising benevolence in another way. The question of benevolence, however, is wholly aside from the real issue involved. The cost of building, supporting, and protecting churches should be paid by those who get the direct benefit of them; the injustice of any other ground is self-evident to all who believe in the separation of Church and State.

And so on. No argument can be adduced in favor of tax-exemption which does not evade the merits of the case. The question is one of equity alone; and all the equitably disposed, whether in or out of the churches, recognize the fact.

GODLY AND UNGODLY.

At a late meeting of Baptist clergymen in Boston, "Rev. Mr. Tower of Allston said that churches are erected and sustained only by the godly portion of the community. This class of the community have no part in imposing upon the public the expenses and burdens arising from misdeeds, requiring for their suppression police courts, etc. The class who cause this burden are the ungodly portion of the community, and they pay nothing to churches. If church property, therefore, be taxed, the ungodly portion of the community will be relieved and the godly portion discriminated against, and heavier burdens imposed upon them. It would be discriminating against the class who add no burdens to the State, by loading them with additional burdens, and in favor of those who impose the burden, by lessening what burdens they already have to bear."

I think we must begin by denying outright the claim that the sin of the community is, in general, outside the churches. To begin with, by far the larger part of petty crimes are committed by the foreign population who are, as a rule, inside the Roman Catholic Church, and contribute more largely than any other class, in proportion to their means, for the erection of church buildings. Among the Protestant population, the larger part of the sins of sensuality and violence may originate among the unchurched; but the more dangerous crimes—such as vast frauds or great social scandals—are more apt, according to my observation, to originate inside the church. This is for the plain reason that church-membership is the easiest of all forms of hypocrisy; and the first thing done by a designing adventurer, in any New England or Western town, is to connect himself with the church, and perhaps, like Stephen Burroughs, to preach sermons from a haymow. He simply does, on a smaller scale, what the Drews and Kallochs do on a larger. Does the Rev. Mr. Tower really believe that Mr. Drew's theological seminary was "erected and sustained only by the godly portion of the community"? For one, the longer I live, the more I am impressed by the absence of any decided difference in moral standard between the inside of the churches and the outside. Even if we were to admit that the churches contain the greater part of the eminently good, it is also true that they contain the greater part of the most dangerous sinners. T. W. H.

MOHAMMED AND THE ISLAM:

BISHOP FERRETTE'S LECTURE.

[We regret that this letter from Mrs. Cheney could not be published last week; but, though a little late, it will be found just as interesting now.—ED.]

On Sunday, Feb. 22, Bishop Ferrette will repeat his lecture on Mohammed to the Twenty-Eighth Congregational Society at the Parker Memorial Hall.

It is an opportunity not lightly to be lost to hear this clear and fair exposition of a great subject from a man whose wide learning, as well as his residence among the followers of the prophet for many years, peculiarly fit for his task.

The question of the influence of Islam is becoming yearly of more and more practical importance to us, since through our closer relations with Asiatic countries we are brought into constant contact with the followers of this faith. A basis of mutual understanding and self-respect is a safer guarantee of peaceful and beneficial intercourse than any political or commercial treatise.

Mohammedanism, or Islam, offers a different problem from that of any other of the great religions of the world. Its beginning is not shrouded in fable and mystery; it lies all within an historic age, not very far from our own; and we have original sources of information about all its important points.

An anonymous author has well said of the doctrines, "They are grand, simple, and decisive." It is true of this, as of all religions, that numerous sects have arisen from it, which distort the text to justify their own views, and which hate each other more cordially than they do outsiders; and yet there is little doubt or dispute about the main points of the doctrine of Islam. A pure monotheism, a revelation from God through his prophets, and a future of rewards and punishments, are clearly and definitely stated.

Bitterly as the Moslem and the Christian have warred against each other in times past, there seems nothing antagonistic in the spiritual faith or moral tenets of the two religions, unless it be in the social institution of polygamy, which is generally condemned by all Christians but those of Utah, who profess to find warrant for it in the Bible.

Carlyle, in one of the grandest of his earlier books, pays magnificent tribute to Mohammed. He says:—

"The word this man spoke has been the life-guidance now of one hundred and eighty millions of men these twelve hundred years. These one hundred and eighty millions were made by God as well as we. A greater number of God's creatures believe in Mohammed's word at this hour than in any other word whatever. Are we to suppose that it was a miserable piece of legerdemain, this which so many creatures of the Almighty have lived by and died by?"

Again he says:—

"No Christians since the early ages, or only perhaps the English Puritans in modern times, have ever stood by their truth as the Moslems do by theirs, believing it wholly, fronting time with it and eternity with it. Zealous missionaries preach it abroad among Malays, black Papuans, brutal idolators, displacing what is worse, nothing that is better or good."

While Bishop Ferrette gives no new or peculiar view of Islam, he does set the facts of Mohammed's life, the composition and contents of the Koran, the doctrines of Islam, and their beneficent effect on the religion and social customs which they displaced, in a very clear light, which will afford new and important information to any one who has not already made a special study of the subject. UNMEANING PHRASES.

"Strange Nemesis of outraged Nature men must worship. Perhaps as Mill would not or could not worship God, it may be matter of devout satisfaction that he made the idol of his soul no worse object than the graceful and gifted woman by whose side he sleeps in the little French cemetery. But that he failed to find in theory or in practice the ultimate and true laws of human life, it only needs the autobiography to place beyond a doubt. We need not wonder that Bentham's heir and James Mill's son, one of the profoundest thinkers, one of the most virtuous men, one of the most gifted philosophers of the present century, completely failed to find that perfect rest, that 'peace which passeth understanding.'"

The above passage is taken from an article, in the British Quarterly Review for January, on John Stuart Mill. The last clause in it contains the phrase that, especially in its connection, we call unmeaning. In a paper of the usual Evangelical tone, the closing words would excite no emotion and call for no comment; for they would be in full consonance with the charges, innuendoes, and slurs with which the Review would be crowded. But the article in the Quarterly is remarkably generous in conceding to Mr. Mill great sweetness of disposition, as well as great intellectual fidelity. The writer has no doubt that he was a man of tenderest and most exquisite sympathies; "that his marriage presented one of the most beautiful examples of perfect union which biography has ever related;" that he "possessed a mind of peculiar energy, thoroughly disciplined and richly stored;" that "his sensibilities were delicate and quick;" that "he was courageous in the highest degree;" that "his soul burned with indignation at wrong done to the slave, the poor, the helpless." Yet he had not the "peace that passeth understanding." Were we in jesting mood, we might say: It passeth understanding what such peace may be. That such a man was not happy is no strange thing. Men of delicate sensibilities and exquisite sympathies are seldom happy. The souls that burn with indignation at misery and wrong in a world full of both, are apt to be sad, whatever their religious opinions may be. But if we were asked to name a man, in our time or in any time, who attained to a condition of mind which unhappiness could not make wretched, which sadness could not make gloomy, which disappointment and effort could not render morose or moody, we should name John Stuart Mill. He lived superior to the disturbances of ordinary peace, in an intellectual atmosphere so serene that the disquietudes of memory and hope, the restlessness that is born, in untrained minds, of dogmatic uncertainties, the agonies and despairs of weak sectaries, caused no ruffle of perturbation on the surface of his spirit. The writer in question admits that one who knows the man only through the far-off distance of his works, feels the charm of his temper. Whose works are permeated with a deeper tone of calmness? So even and quiet is it, that his single passionate outburst in allusion to Mansel, which occurs in the Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy, excited general surprise, and was quoted everywhere as proof that Mill could leave his serene world of ideas, for an instant.

The peace that passeth the understanding of all but rare minds, that decidedly passes the understanding of the religious people one is accustomed to meet, is the peace that Mill had; and he owed it, partly, no doubt, to a cool, passionless temperament, partly to a sweet, moonlit disposition, but in no small degree to the philosophical training which raised him above the crowds of disputants, and enabled him to look down on the plain of the world's credences, as the gazer from the Cattskill ledge looks down on the patchwork of separate farms that portion out the valley of the Hudson. Let those who possess perfect peace themselves challenge the genuineness of his. But until "Evangelical" Christians give evidence of a profounder spiritual calm than they show at present, we must conclude that their lamentations over Mill's want of repose betray their own ignorance of the true nature of repose. THE PRACTICAL TEST.

It is sometimes objected that the Free Religious movement is not socially practical—that it is concerned too much with speculative problems, too little with questions that pertain to social evils and social regeneration. This criticism is made by some who are excellent members and friends of the Free Religious Association. It has been said that the point which Mr. Weiss made against the Evangelical Alliance,—that it only gave one session out of its ten days' meetings to the consideration of "Social Evils," spending all the rest of its numerous sessions on questions of theology and ecclesiasticism,—might be turned with equal force against the Free Religious Convention which Mr. Weiss was addressing.

Now if this criticism could be substantiated, it would doubtless be a very grave one. If it can be proved that Free Religion is simply interested in the subtilties of metaphysics, that it is wanting in humanity, and turns the cold shoulder to the ills that afflict human society, then it is proved to want the one thing that is absolutely essential to any faith that expects to move the world, or to make much headway in the world. That faith will win the victory which has in it the most real humanity. "By their fruits ye shall know them" is a good practical test of the worth of any doctrine. But is the criticism, either in its general or special statement, true?

From the outset, the Free Religious Association has aimed to show the intimate, vital connection there is between religion and social well-being. One of its strongest arguments against the dogmatism, sectarianism, and ecclesiasticism that prevail with such power in the churches has been that these objects now absorb a vast deal of mental and moral force, not to speak of financial means, which might be emancipated and put to service directly in the education and improvement of human society. While the Association is not, as Mr. Frothingham has pointed out, any special social reform society,—not a society organized for supplying free soup to the poor, nor for providing employment to the idle, nor for specially advocating this or that particular temperance measure, nor for giving special consideration to the problems of Labor Reform and the question of Woman Suffrage,—while it is not a society organized for any one of these specific objects, it is a society organized for the promotion of such freedom to the human faculties, and of such moral and spiritual culture, as will secure all the highest objects of philanthropy and social welfare; and hardly a convention of the Association has been held in which pains have not been taken to set forth this practical relation of religion to social reform. At different times, various phases of this subject have been presented on the Association's platform by Mr. F. B. Sanborn, Mr. Wendell Phillips, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, Mr. A. M. Powell, Mr. D. A. Wasson, Col. Higginson, and others. If there was any defect on this point at the New York Convention, it was not because the Committee overlooked the point, but because speakers and time failed. It was much desired that Mr. Weiss' paper should be followed by an address on the social ills and needs of such a city as New York; but the man could not be found to prepare it, and the more extempore speech that was to have taken its place on this topic was cut off for want of time. The essay of Mr. Weiss, however (not to speak of one or two other brief speeches on the topic), did indirectly touch the whole question of social evils, and at its close, though too briefly, he indicated the method by which, in his view, Free Religion would deal with it,—the method of substituting for mediatorial faith a practical knowledge and observance of natural laws: in other words, social science, in all its various departments and objects, is the natural ally of Free Religion.

In regard to this question whether the Free Religious movement is philosophical rather than practical, it should be considered, too, what those who are interested in it are doing as individuals. Are they speculating in metaphysics chiefly, or are they practical workers in society? As a matter of fact, they are almost without exception interested in some one or other or in all of the questions of social reform that are now agitating the community. They are in the Woman's Rights movement, or the Temperance movement, or the Social Science Association, or the Prison Reform agitation, or the Freedmen's Education Commissions. One difficulty that we have in finding the right speakers to present the social aspect of Free Religion at our meetings is that they are too busy doing the work to come and speak about it. When we fixed the day of the Annual Meeting in Boston in Anniversary Week, it was hard to select the day, because it was known that most of those who would want to come to the Free Religious Convention would want to attend also the Woman's Suffrage, or Temperance, or Labor Reform, or Freedmen's, or some other meetings the same week. And if we go back to the great anti-slavery struggle, we shall find that most of those who are now in the Free Religious movement were heart and soul in that great movement, or are the children of those who were.

The Free Religious men and women, it would seem, therefore, need not fear to meet the practical test that faith must show itself in works of humanity. Still, it will do no harm if friendly critics shall remind them that by that test their faith will be judged,—that philosophical speculation alone does not heal the diseases of society. On the other hand, it may be well to remind these friendly critics that thought is a very important agency in healing the evils of society, and lifting humanity upward. The greatest movements for the amelioration of mankind have begun in an idea, in thought, perhaps in a philosopher's brain. If the Protestant movement, or even Christianity, had been asked at the outset to show their fruit by some grand social amelioration, they might have been pronounced failures. What each did was to plant an idea, and to trust to the slow process of natural germination and growth for the better social condition to come from it. So the main work of the Free Religious Association is to sow ideas,—in the hope and belief that from the ideas will spring gradually all noble philanthropies and happier conditions of society. And the point of the criticism against the Evangelical Alliance was not that it spent so much time in the discussion of ideas, but that it spent so much time in finding supports for ideas that have had their day, and that the world is fast outgrowing.

LONDON LETTER.

To the Editor of The Index:

Sir,—It has been well said that "a little help is worth a great deal of pity;" and I have been thinking how the question of opening museums and picture galleries, and so forth, on Sundays may be practically solved.

The chief objection generally urged against this innovation is that it presses hardly upon the officers and employés, in forcing them to follow their callings on the Sunday, and thereby preventing them from taking their own share of recreation, and from going to a place of worship.

Not merely on religious grounds, but on the broad grounds of humanity and justice, this objection has great weight with even the advocates of the opening of museums, &c.; and I fancy there is a very good way of meeting it, if men are so inclined.

Already a great number of excellent people find a sort of pleasure and recreation in works of mercy and charity on the Sunday; works involving sometimes great labor, but which are not injurious because they are totally different to the mental or physical fatigue of ordinary occupations.

Our Sunday-schools are often presided over by laymen, and entirely taught by kind ladies and gentlemen who work hard enough all the week in their several spheres, and yet find refreshment in the toil of the school.

Others visit the hospitals, or pay ministering visits to sick friends, it may be, at long distances from their homes, and therefore having to take a journey more or less tiring.

Now why should not a number of ladies and gentlemen, of unquestioned position and trustworthiness, band together to form a volunteer corps for the relief of officers and servants employed in our museums and galleries?

In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the work is so simple as to require no elaborate education for its proper performance; and in the hundredth case a little extra exertion spent on qualifying oneself for the part would surely be willingly undertaken.

One staff of fifty or one hundred persons might undertake the duties of some particular institution, and keep to it on the Sunday as they now keep to their particular, or parish, Sunday-school.

They might be drilled and organized as completely for such work as they are now drilled for military service; and, over and above the mere satisfaction of bearing their brothers' burdens, such help would form a new and indissoluble tie between the classes which at present are not on the best of terms with each other. Such a voluntary undertaking of work now performed by the less cultured classes would give a tone of dignity to the work itself, and make those who earn their bread by it look upon it with more pride, and come to do it better in consequence.

Besides this, gentlemen and even ladies might add immensely to the pleasure and benefit of a visit to a museum or gallery by imparting what higher knowledge they possessed, and drawing the attention of the uninitiated to objects or features which they otherwise might have missed.

If I were a lounger at the clubs, and had to yawn away my Sunday afternoons in the dullest of all dull cities (which ours most certainly is on the "Lord's Day"), "I would rather be a doorkeeper" in one of those "houses of God" which are yet superstitiously closed; and I should consider myself honored in being allowed to minister in the smallest degree to the comfort, well-being, and instruction of the uneducated portion of our great population. Were I a lady, I would gladly take a broom and sweep up the dust made by the holy tramp of those who had come in search of more truth and light. Certainly, on the score of toil, no work could be a greater drudgery than that of the Sunday-school—the very name is suggestive of most dreary melancholy.

And so I would fain hope that, as large armies of noble-hearted men and women have taxed all their Sabbaths to teach poor children Bibles and catechisms, so there will be no lack of volunteers for the more wholesome exertion of helping directly or indirectly to expand the minds and please the tastes of those childrens' parents.

In America you have your volunteer fire-brigades. You know, then, how to organize such labor as I describe, and which in no case can involve a tithe of the preparation and training needful for firemen.

We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that, as things stand, the artisan class is practically shut out from all but a rare attendance at our museums and galleries of art. We keep these luxuries for the well-to-do and the comparatively idle; and this is a sore point in the body politic. Such a scandal ought to be promptly removed, and the causes of such discontent abolished without delay.

Moreover, were the plan to be tried on the Sunday, and proved to work well, volunteers would then be so numerous that the division of labor among them would make it a mere trifle for each one. By-and-by, similar organizations would be formed to help people at times of pressure in business, when help promptly and efficiently given would save an overworked brain from utter prostration, as well as rescue a business from the perils of failure.

A brigade of helpers would indeed not only be a blessing to all who needed help, but a credit, an honor, and a glory to the country which first presented such a spectacle to the world.

I don't think the most bigoted person would ever dare ask such men, "What church or sect do you belong to?" or, "What is your creed?"

I am, sir, very truly yours,

Charles Voysey.

Camden House, Dulwich, Jan. 31, 1874.

Bishop Ellicott is delivering a series of charges in his diocese. In the first of these, speaking of free thought and ritualism, he said that there were two influences constantly working against the Church; the one was free thought or infidelity, the other enslaved thought or superstition. Nine years ago he had declared his conviction that all things were gradually preparing the way for that last and worst form of unbelief—the denial of the personality of the God and Father of all. But he could not have imagined the development would come so quickly; and as doubt and suspended belief had extended, ritualism and ceremonialism, he feared he might even say superstition, had advanced in exactly the opposite direction. —London Graphic.

THE LATE JUDGE CONKLING.

UTICA, N. Y., Feb. 8, 1874.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Scientific philosophy is entitled to the legacy inherited from the rich intellect of Alfred Conkling; and I deem it due to his memory to prevent any misapprehension upon this question, by sending you the enclosed letter. A copy of the Memorial to which it alludes was sent to THE INDEX in 1870, and was addressed to the regents of the University of New York, requesting a renovation of our public instruction adapted to modern times. Judge Conkling signed the Memorial, and Judge Johnson, of the Court of Appeals, then a regent, presented it. It was referred to a committee which has never been heard from to my knowledge. Respectfully,

RUTGER B. MILLER.

GENESEO, N. Y., Jan. 18, 1870.

MY DEAR SIR:—

Your favor, accompanied by the Memorial, came in due course of mail; and I have the pleasure to receive yours of day before yesterday.

The disposition of the Memorial is gratifying,—though I share your apprehensions that the intelligence and independence of a majority of those to whom it is addressed may prove inadequate to the immediate effective recognition of its importance and of the high duties it imposes. But it will not die. There are thousands who will gladly adopt it as their banner, and unite in inscribing on its ample folds, as their motto, Nulla vestigia retrorsum. I concur with you most cordially in the gratification you feel at Judge Johnson's connection with it. I think I see clearly how he may not only render invaluable service to humanity, but also by means of it secure to himself an enviable and enduring fame. He has but to devote to the subject of it unsparingly the superior intellectual endowments for which I long ago learned to give him credit, and fearlessly send forth the fruits of his labors in an elaborate report.

What you say of the vacancy in the Board of regents reminds me of an observation in your former letter expressive of the pleasure it afforded you to see how insignificant our casual political antagonisms had proved as an impediment to our coöperations in this far-reaching effort to elevate our race. The same thing had occurred to me.

You know how sadly forgetful I have become, especially of names. It may well be that I have known something of Mr. Fiske; but I am obliged to acknowledge that I cannot recall him. I have read a lecture (in the New York Tribune of Dec. 18) before the American Institute, on "The Battlefields of Science," which pleased me much, by Mr. White, President of Cornell University.

With great regard, cordially yours,

ALFRED CONKLING.

THE HONORABLE RUTGER B. MILLER.

WHO SHALL DECIDE?

FRIEND ABBOT:—

"If a man die shall he live again?" has been a question of deep moment to millions of minds. I regret THE INDEX considers it of so little importance that it treats with indifference,—to say the least,—the only evidence in proof of the affirmative of this question; namely, Spiritualism and Spiritual Manifestations.

It is inconceivable to me how any intelligent, inquiring mind can rest satisfied with this question unanswered, when the means of answering it are within reach. Interesting as are the discussions as to the origin of man, how vastly more so is the question of his Immortal Destiny!

But, friend Abbot, you think that science and scientists ignore the manifestations, and deem it not worth their while to look at the subject. Is he a disciple of truth, or a student of Nature, who will not push his investigations in search of every fact or phenomenon which promises light upon any subject which it is his business to explore? If psychology, or the science of man, does not come within the province of the scientist, then he is excusable. But what would be thought of a man who assumed to know all about chemistry, for instance, who had never given any attention to it? Of what value, therefore, is the opinion of Prof. Huxley, or any other man, upon any subject he has not examined?

Not one scientific and candid mind can be found who has pushed his investigations and inquiries into this subject, giving it that patient attention he would give to acquire a knowledge of chemistry,—not one has done this who has not been fully convinced of the interposition of spiritual beings, in the production of those innumerable manifestations which go to establish the fact, beyond all peradventure, of an open communication between this world of effects, which we see around us, and the world of causes, lying back of us as "the power behind the throne."

One more question, and I am done. Assuming that nobody has common sense and discrimination enough to decide upon this question but professors of colleges and scientists, are not those scientific minds who have investigated and become Spiritualists equally as capable of coming to correct conclusions, as those who ignore and spit upon the whole thing? "Let truth and falsehood grapple."

Yours faithfully,

MILO A. TOWNSEND.

[We have never spoken or written a disrespectful word, so far as we remember, concerning the belief in immortality; and we are entirely unconscious of having treated Spiritualists superciliously, contemptuously, or unkindly, in THE INDEX or out of it. If we had not tried repeatedly, and as often failed, to find the evidences of direct spirit-communication which have been so profusely promised, we might be justly charged with treating them "with indifference." But is it our fault that the promised evidences have proved unsatisfactory? Let those who are satisfied remain so; we have no wish to disturb any faith which respects the faith of others, and are glad to bear testimony to the general liberality of the Spiritualists. But we must confess it seems to us unreasonable to require any man to give his time to any subject which does not, in his opinion (however erroneous it may be), seem to promise results that shall be a fair equivalent for the time consumed. We congratulate any one who has demonstrated spirit-intercourse to his own satisfaction; but we must be content with cherishing the hope of immortality, while we give our chief attention to the great, immediate duties of the hour. Let everybody use his opportunities and capacities in the way he judges most beneficial to himself and to his race; and then there will be no cause to complain of anybody.—ED.]

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

"We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation"—is no longer the cry of Liberals alone; it is fast becoming the universal demand of the people, from one end of the land to the other. "We, the property-holders, demand that our property shall no longer be assessed at double its value, to cover the deficiency made by the non-taxation of the vast extents of real estate held in the name of the churches." "We, the tax-payers, protest, in the name of common justice, against contributing more than our equitable proportion of the Governmental expense of protecting our property, while millions upon millions of other property, receiving the same protection in every respect, contribute not one dime." These are the cries that are going up from an oppressed people.

California, Alabama, Missouri, Mississippi, have taken a bold stand in opposition to the unjust exemption of church property; and even down-trodden Louisiana is awakening, at last, to a sense of the real cause of much of her misfortune,—excessive taxation. Especially is this the case in the city of New Orleans, where every dollar of private property is taxed nominally five and a half per cent., but really, by over-assessment, from ten to twelve per cent.; but where $20,000,000 of church property (one-seventh of the whole amount of taxable property) enjoys absolute immunity. Every year it is assessed (assessors receiving five per cent. of all values assessed); but it is as regularly exempted, being "privileged property." But why privileged? It shares all the benefits; why not share the burdens?

One of our city dailies contained a well-considered editorial upon the subject yesterday, from which I quote: "That property of this kind, situated in New Orleans, amounts to $20,000,000 is probably a fair estimate. In the present unfortunate condition of our finances, does it not seem unjust that so large an amount of property should contribute no revenue to the State? . . . . The State protects it, is responsible if its citizens destroy it, and receives no return. It will be said that many churches are unable to pay,—that the levying of a tax would close them up. A natural question arises: Who would be hurt? Very few of the many churches of the city have full congregations on Sunday. If the theatres did not gather a larger number of paying patrons each night, they would close very soon. There are too many churches for the number of church-goers. . . . As stated by an able writer, churches are continually adding to their property, and growing out of all proportion, by the aid of their right of exemption. . . . By accumulating and holding property, which thus no longer returns a revenue, it becomes a burden instead of a help. . . . It is not sounding a false alarm to express the fear that some time the amount of property producing no revenue will be in excess of that which supports the State. There is but one remedy for this, and that is to cast aside the unreasonable scruples against taxation, and force the church property to an equality with all other. . . . Let the wealthy church that rears its proud edifice on the most valuable land, that receives the voluntary contribution from rich and poor alike, that pays its thousands for the music that draws the crowds who neglect others which offer only words of piety,—let that church bear its just share of the public burdens of the impoverished State that protects it from fire, from the thief, and from the mob."

This is sound doctrine, and it is a notable "sign of the times," when the daily papers contain such editorials as that.

An article from the Watchman and Reflector was recently copied into the Christian Union, calling attention to the rapid spread of Catholicism, and the vast amounts of property held by papists. But a short time ago they were the poorest denomination; but they have rapidly become the wealthiest in church property, and are steadily marching on in the same direction, with omnivorous greed. I quote from the last mentioned paper: "We believe it is a mistake to exempt church property in any form from taxation. It is not enough to say that the Church is a blessing to the State. So is every good man; many of our towns and villages have nothing more valuable in them than some of their refined families of broad culture and high-toned morals. It would be bad policy, however, to exempt all such from local taxation. The State has no more right to tax an unbeliever for the support of the Gospel than England now has to tax dissenters for the support of the Established Church. Further, the whole thing works badly, as every wrong principle always does." After pointing out the results of this system in England before the Reformation, in Mexico, in France, in Italy, the editor concludes: "We say, let us have the law which exempts church property repealed. Every consideration urges it."

The National Baptist, of Philadelphia, goes further than this even, and says: "We regard all exemption of ministers from taxation, from military service, and from jury duty, as coming under the same head [union of Church and State]. The law does not know any man as religious or irreligious, as minister or layman."

Thus the ball that Francis E. Abbot first set in motion rolls grandly on. Like the snowball, rolling down the mountain-side, ever increasing in weight and strength, it shall finally become a mighty avalanche, crushing down all opposition, overwhelming the forests of bigotry and superstition, uprooting mighty trees of error. Dissolving, finally, in the glorious sunshine of success, it shall flow through the fertile plains of freedom in a thousand streams, all flowing into the great ocean of truth.

MRS. J. R. WALKER.

NEW ORLEANS, Jan., 1874.

A PEEP AT GEORGIA.

MADISON, Ga., Jan. 19, 1874.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—

Enclosed find post-office order for $18.00, which you will credit to the following names, for one year's subscription to THE INDEX: Hon. J. Hill, $5.00; Hon. T. P. Safford, $8.00; Dr. A. A. Bell, $5.00.

It affords me pleasure to say THE INDEX is read, admired, and appreciated by some of the best minds in our small town. It is hailed as a messenger of free and independent thought, containing propositions that set the mind to thinking. In the eddy-pools of the old Orthodox theology, free thought is discouraged, and every inquiry is settled by a blind appeal to a supposed "revelation," however absurd the conclusion. But the free inquiry unwittingly set afloat by the admission of Protestants is fast leading to another reformation—a reformation from supernaturalism to naturalism. The minds of men are becoming free, and it is no longer deemed a virtue to believe and teach what nature contradicts. Blind faith is losing its empire in the domain of thought; and that which is above and against reason has no longer the power to hold the manly understanding in thraldom as formerly.

Our churches here represent old-fashioned Orthodoxy—the same old song—"Believe in Christ and be saved from hell; disbelieve and be damned." If now and then we have a minister that rises a little above the common level, he stultifies himself, by declaring "unbelief" to be a "mania of the heart," as Dr. Wills asserted in the pulpit in this place.

On the other hand, such a mind as Buckle regarded doubt, scepticism, as the beginning of wisdom. But the secret is, free inquiry and hacking into the root of things, is death to old Orthodoxy. Its great strong-hold is "faith;" without that it would have no vitality. It has nothing to offer to satisfy the rational mind. Where THE INDEX is read, the mind soon becomes awakened out of its Orthodox lethargy; so much so that those who acquire a new way of thinking are sometimes called crazy. Why, I was taught, when I was a boy, that it was a sin to cross my legs on Sunday. I have heard the clergy tell of persons being struck dead because they danced on the Sabbath day.

Now, as little as you may think of it, the greatest hindrances to free inquiry and free thought are the women of the land. They do not trouble themselves to hunt up new ideas, and to investigate in new fields. Why this is so I cannot tell, satisfactorily to myself, unless it is their proverbial credulity. After all, the domestic field is a beautiful place for woman.

> "I love to see her gentle form
> Dispose with modest grace
> The household things about her home,
> And keep each thing in place."

Still, I do not like to see her discourage the manly free thoughts of her husband. I have had them say to me: "I have been told you don't believe in a devil." "A regular Orthodox devil?" "Yes." "Well, then, you have been correctly informed." "And you don't?" "No." "Oh, you perfectly horrify me!" responds the gentle woman, whose mind I had thought above such a superstitious idea. But why should I be surprised when our pulpits and Bible teach the existence of the devil as a personal entity as much as they teach the existence of a God?

Whenever the women of the land shall take up the subject of looking into things for themselves, behind the glass as well as in it, a new era will have dawned upon the world; and whatever right she is entitled to will have been won. Respectfully,

A. A. B.

A PICTURE.—If Nast should make a picture of a man with a meeting-house on his back, carrying it wearily on the journey of life, with these words coming out of his mouth: "This is a grievous burden, but I must carry it to keep my soul out of hell in the next life;" and just behind him his wife, with a fat, well-dressed clergyman on her back, with these words coming out of her mouth: "Our dear, good minister! We must take care of him, for the laborer is worthy of his hire;" and following a little in the rear, a large family of barefooted, ragged, uneducated, hungry children, would the artist come very far short of expressing what can be seen almost everywhere in actual life?—Earlville Transcript.

THE IRISHMAN had a correct appreciation of the business who, being asked by the judge, when he applied for a license to sell whiskey, if he was of a good moral character, replied, "Faith, yer honor, I don't see the necessity of a good moral character to sell whiskey."

THERE IS A MAN who wants the rich people to summer in New York State, and not go over to Jersey. He says: "It is said that the New Jersey watering-places are rapidly filling up with mosquitoes, and never before were they so thoroughly organized and confident of success."

AT A RECENT examination of one of the schools in Washington, the question was put to a class of small boys: "Why is the Connecticut River so called?" when a bright little fellow held up his hand. "Do you know, James?" "Yes, ma'am; because it connects Vermont and New Hampshire, and cuts through Massachusetts!" was the triumphant reply.

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

THE WORD—A Monthly Journal of Reform—

Regarding the subjection of Labor, of Woman, and the Prevalence of War as unnatural evils, induced by false claims to obedience and service, favors the Abolition of the State, of Property in Land and its kindred resources, of speculative income and all other means whereby Intrusion acquires wealth and power at the expense of Useful People. Since Labor is the source of Wealth and creates all values equitably vendible, THE WORD (not by restrictive methods, but through liberation and reciprocity) seeks the extinction of interest, rent, dividends, and profit, except as they represent work done; the abolition of railway, telegraphic, banking, trades-union and other corporations charging more than actual cost for values furnished, and the repudiation of all so-called debts, the principal whereof has been paid, in the form of interest.

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also, that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to

Form a Liberal League,

we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished is held at HOSPITALLER HALL, 593 Washington Street, Boston, every Sunday, at 10½ A.M., 2½ and 7½ P.M. All that relates to the Religious, Political, and Social interests of mankind constitute the subjects for discussion. THE INDEX and Index Tracts are for sale every Sunday at Hospitaller Hall.

FREE DISCUSSION

CIRCULATE! Circulate!! Circulate

THOSE PETITIONS. Don't feel satisfied when your petition is a yard long, unless you have asked every one to sign it. Get good, influential names.

GET EVERYBODY.

Don't neglect to show the petition to any one, because he is a stockholder in some church, or other exempted property, as many such persons admit the justice of the demand; and those who will not should be made to take the responsibility of refusing to sign it.

Don't delay! We want the petitions returned early.

BUST OF THEODORE PARKER,

BY

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak, then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished in plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

$5 TO $20 PER DAY easily made by any one. We want men, women, boys, and girls all over the country to sell our fine Steel Engravings, Chromos, Crayon Drawings, Illuminations, Photographs, etc., etc. We now publish the finest assortment ever placed before the public, and our prices are marked down so low as to defy all competition. No one subscribes for a premium-giving paper in order to get a picture, after seeing our pictures and learning our prices. We have many old agents at work for us, who have made canvassing for books, papers, etc., their business for years, and they all report that they can make much more money at work for us than at anything else. Our prices are so low that all can afford to purchase, and therefore the pictures sell at sight at almost every house. New beginners do as well as agents who have had large experience, for our beautiful subjects and low prices are appreciated by all. To make large sales everywhere all an agent has to do is to show the pictures from house to house. Don't look for work elsewhere until you have seen what great inducements we offer you to make money. We have not space to explain all here, but send us your address and we will send full particulars, free, by mail. Don't delay if you want profitable work for your leisure hours, or for your whole time. Now is the favorable time to engage in this business. Our pictures are the finest and most pleasing in this country, and are endorsed by all the leading papers, including the New York Herald. Those who cannot give the business their entire attention can work up their own localities, and make a handsome sum without ever being away from home over night. Let all who want pleasant, profitable employment, without risking capital, send us their addresses at once, and learn all about the business for themselves. Address

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

IT IS ASSERTED that there will be eighty-three supporters of the Irish "Home Rule" movement in the new Parliament of England.

THE SUPREME COURT of Massachusetts believes that women have a right to be elected to School Committees. Very good for the Supreme Court.

A CORRESPONDENT to the New York Tribune, who has seen and conversed with Castelar, says that the great Spaniard is "very fond of Emerson."

WE ARE TOLD that Cardinal Bonaparte procured five hundred Masses to be said for the repose of the soul of Napoleon III. We are astonished that so small a number was thought sufficient!

ONE OF THE INDEX subscribers, in discontinuing his subscription, says: "I go but very little on anything that is called religious. I am a-reading the Boston Investigator, and the Truth Seeker."

THE FRIENDS of Mr. Bradlaugh, in his absence, put him in nomination for Parliament from Northampton, and appear to have made a spirited canvass for him; but it seems that they were not successful.

BY THE knowledge and practice of eternal principles, not of human laws, are men made better, and society improved. Statute laws are more often the expression of human will and human passion, than of human wisdom and human love.

MR. BRADLAUGH is quite enthusiastic over Mr. Emerson, whom he met once or twice in this country. He speaks of the "sage of Concord" as "a kind, truthful-looking man, reminding me somewhat, in his countenance, of the late Robert Owen."

WHEN BUDDHISM first entered Japan—in the sixth century—it was violently persecuted; but at present it is the popular religion in that country. In 1869, it had one hundred and sixty-eight thousand priests, and over four hundred and sixty thousand temples.

WE REJOICE to learn that Roberts Brothers are about to publish a new edition of the works of Margaret Fuller, which have long been out of print. We advise all radicals, and, indeed, all thoughtful, earnest persons, to buy these books. No American's library is complete without them.

THE "GREAT PYRAMID," says Prof. Darwin G. Eaton, is the largest building ever erected by man. It is built of stone, 762 feet long and wide, being perfectly square, and 480 feet high, and covers thirteen acres of ground. Prof. Smythe, Royal Astronomer at Edinburgh, puts the date of its erection 2,180 years B.C.

JOHN RUSKIN, in the Pall Mall Gazette, says: "There are numbers of the people I should like to murder." We submit to Mr. Ruskin that the people are not so bad as the false ideas which possess them. Murder the ideas, Mr. Ruskin, or supplant them with better ones, and then "the people" will do well enough!

LUCY STONE has a stirring and ringing article in the Woman's Journal, of Feb. 28, on the sale of Abby Kelley Foster's homestead, in Worcester, for taxes. This late manifestation of the tyranny of the law is a new and moving argument for woman's rights. We blush for the honor of Massachusetts until this wrong is corrected.

TWO HUNDRED and eighty thousand persons are distressed from want of food in some districts in India. We respectfully suggest that Christian Missionary Societies direct their money to the relief of these starving heathen, instead of attempting the "saving of their souls." This would be "pure and undefiled religion," as St. James puts it.

THAT VETERAN old reformer, Josiah Warren, remarks: "While I honor the generous sympathies that inspire the wide-spread and earnest protests against the enslavement of women, men, and children, under the prevailing aggressive institutions, I take no very active part in demolition; as that work is already being done faster than remedies follow."

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, having heard Mrs. Julia Ward Howe speak on one occasion, says: "Mrs. Howe strongly recalled to me the cold, intellectual face of Archbishop Manning; but she manifested feeling as well as intellect in her brief address." He speaks of Kate Stanton as "an abler speaker than any of the American women I have yet listened to;" and thinks she is "a woman of great promise on the platform."

THE CHINESE annals say: "Music hath the power of making heaven descend upon earth; it inspireth men with the love of virtue and the fulfilment of duty. Wouldst thou know whether a kingdom is well governed, whether its morals are good or bad?—see what kind of music is customary there." All very true; but, mercy on us! we hope the Chinese are themselves an exception to this rule, for we should be very sorry to think that their morals are as bad as their music.

MR. DAWES, in his late speech in Congress on the finances, says the Nation, "told a little story" of a certain Republican who was appointed to an appraisership at a salary of $3,000 a year; but, finding that the office was a sinecure, he honestly wrote to his senators telling them so, and suggesting its abolition. Far from abolishing the office, however, the Great Party promptly removed the discontented office-holder, without assigning any reason; but, he presumed, "on the ground of insanity."

A LITTLE GIRL writes to Mr. Beecher, in the Christian Union, and tells him that in her Sunday-school lessons she finds "Son of Man" and "Son of God" spoken of; and she says, "Will you please explain how they can both be the same?" Mr. Beecher "explains" by saying that Christ is the "Son of God as partaker of the Divine nature," and "Son of man because, when he came to earth, he was born, as to his bodily nature, of man." We hope the little girl will follow up the subject, and ask Mr. Beecher to explain his explanation.

"IN THE holy word Freedom," observes Josiah Warren, "we encounter the anxious world's greatest problem; one which waits for solution in a definition acceptable to all: but the defects of abstract language have baffled all attempts to furnish one. Almost with fear and trembling, I ventured, years ago, to offer one; on the condition, however, that I should preserve my freedom to change it whenever increasing knowledge should show its defects. And I gave—the sovereignty of every individual over his or her own person, time, property, and responsibilities."

THE NEW JERSEY LEGISLATURE is considering an amendment to the Constitution of that State, which forbids interference by the Legislature in the local government of towns and cities. The Senate has already passed the amendment, and the House probably will. This is a step in the right direction. Since the war, our American people have been possessed with the idea of centralization—a strong national government, and comparatively weak local dependencies. But the good old democratic doctrine of local self-government is the right doctrine. The farther from home we put our government, the worse it is likely to be. The whole nation is constantly nervous, lest the government at Washington will do some foolish or some wicked thing. When Congress adjourns, and Gen. Grant is left to his horses and dogs, we shall all breathe easier.

The Unknown not the Unknowable.

BY A. W. STEVENS.

For there is nothing hid, which shall not be manifest; neither was anything kept secret, but that it should come abroad.—[Gospel according to Mark, iv., 22.]

As a lover of knowledge and a seeker after truth, I rejoice in this affirmation. It fills me with adoring gratitude and divine ecstasy to believe that the infinite treasures of knowledge are not jealously hoarded and hidden, but are only held in reserve to be imparted to us as fast and fully as we can apprehend and receive them. With this conviction there comes a new sense of our immortality. Our life is touched with a grand significance, as we catch a view of the magnificent intellectual and spiritual prospect that opens before us. Now, we feel, we live to some purpose, and the future of our career is golden with promise. The universe invites us to the banquet of intelligence! The miserable crumbs of the feast will not be thrown to us, nor shall we be kept as beggars at the gate; but the door is flung wide open, and we are bidden to come freely in, and to be welcome to all there is! We are encouraged to desire and expect the best there is, and are told that the entrance to knowledge shall never be shut to us; but that while we have eyes which long to see, and ears which long to hear, both vision and audience shall be granted to us, and the glories of the universe unrevealed shall evermore continue to be revealed. Nothing is hid which was not meant to be made manifest; nothing is kept secret which was not intended should in due time come abroad!

In the light of this conviction, how puerile seems to us the old fable—still, however, believed by many as Bible truth—that our first parents were terribly punished for exercising an inquiring spirit, for seeking to press into those realms of knowledge which all untrodden lay before them! That mythological invention would make it appear that there were some things which the Creator had hidden that he did not mean even his most intelligent creatures should discover, and that he had some secrets which he intended ever jealously to guard against their curiosity. It represents that the inquiring spirit which our first parents showed was regarded in the sight of Heaven as sinful, and that God was really afraid that these inquisitive people would become as knowing as himself, and force themselves into partnership with him in all his wisdom. It solemnly depicts his rage on finding out what a pair of irrepressible Yankees he had made, and proceeds to unfold the penalty of their iniquitous curiosity—a penalty no less than a fearful curse upon them, and upon all their inquisitive posterity, forever.

A condemnation of the spirit of inquiry—this is the lesson of the old Bible story of Adam and Eve! And it is a lesson which the Church in all ages has endeavored to enforce. In imitation of the injunction of the Bible-God to his first pair of children, the Church has ever said to all its followers: "It is good for you to know only what I choose to tell you; your knowledge must be limited by my measure, and your inquiring spirit must be restricted within my compass." But what reasonable being who reads the old fable is not glad that Adam and Eve persisted in gratifying their love of knowledge; that they rebelled against the limits assigned to them, and pushed their inquiries over the bounds of the known into the inexhaustible regions of the unknown? And who that has inherited from the foundation and stock of our human race the inquiring spirit, does not rejoice to-day that the past has never been barren of dauntless souls who have broken through the barriers which the Church has assigned, demanding that no door should be closed to free inquiry, insisting upon the right of unlimited investigation, and of carrying the torch of reason into every quarter where the least ray of light may fall upon the darkness of the unknown? The lesson of the old fable the free spirit in man refuses to learn. Though it has been prescribed again and again by those who have assumed the duty to keep watch and guard over the secrets of Heaven, yet again and again has freedom-loving man put the prescription away from him, and resolutely gone forward in the quest of knowledge. Even penalties and pains have not prevented him. Has knowledge its dangers? Yes, indeed; but they are not so great as those of ignorance. Death, surely, does not come by knowledge—life, rather. The old fable taught better than it knew. Before Adam and Eve ate the forbidden fruit they had no offspring; after that they were fruitful of children. Sheer ignorance must needs be childless; it knows not how even to reproduce itself, but dies of unvirile and unambitious sloth. On the contrary, knowledge is virile to the last degree: it is robust with ambitious passion, and burns to multiply itself over and over again. Its progeny is legion, and fill the whole earth. Death is the still-born issue of ignorance, but lusty LIFE springs from the loins of knowledge.

If we mistake not, the inquiring spirit of man, which has led him to transcend the limits assigned by the Church, will also cause him to protest against those which a certain school of philosophy, and certain men of science, say do necessarily and absolutely obstruct his pursuit of knowledge. We can only know phenomena, it is said. Of first causes, or of a first cause, we can know nothing. The outcome of all knowledge, we are told, is the stern and stubborn fact "that the power which the universe manifests to us is utterly inscrutable." Thus, in our search after the infinite, we are called to halt at the threshold of the finite; in our endeavor to inquire into the essence and soul of things, we are bidden to take our seat in despair on things themselves, and are told that their spiritual significance is a mystery which we neither have nor can have any key to unlock. Matter exists, and force acts in matter—this, we are informed, is the sum of all possible human knowledge. That man is immortal, or that God is the love and wisdom, as well as the power of the universe, we are warned we can never know. "The unknown is the unknowable" is the ominous sentence that falls upon our ear, and which is intended to rebuke our fond and foolish enthusiasm for inquiring into mysteries which are declared to be "utterly inscrutable."

Now to all this the aspiring heart and ambitious mind of man are moved to reply: "We hope for and we expect better things. That our present knowledge is very limited we confess; that, as yet, we have no demonstration of spiritual realities we allow. But, on the other hand, we also perceive and insist that there is no absolute proof against these realities—no absolute proof that God is not, that the soul is not—no absolute proof that the mysteries of the infinite are utterly inscrutable to the finite. We believe that the truth exists to be known, and we have great faith in our capacity to know it. We esteem it dogmatism to say that the unknown is the unknowable, for it is a fact that the unknown is giving way every day to knowledge. We likewise esteem it dogmatism to say that only phenomena can be known; for phenomena are manifestations, not of themselves, but of that something behind them which is the cause of them. We cannot, therefore, know phenomena without also knowing, to some extent, the power which produces them; so far forth as that power is manifested in these phenomena, it becomes knowable by us, and cannot, therefore, be said to be utterly inscrutable. Neither do we believe that it is safe to say just where the limit is to this knowledge which we have of the Power that manifests itself in the universe. We believe that we have an equal right to call it God, as certain men of science to call it force; and somehow we have great confidence that it is not mere Power, but likewise Love and Wisdom. Not only does the vast universe seem to us to shine with the ill-concealed light of a spiritual meaning, but our own bodies also dilate with a half-consciousness of a soul within them, to which we think we owe our lofty attitude of hope and expectation. That attitude we propose to keep, and shall allow no dogmas of science or philosophy to frighten us away from it."

Man, then, is not ashamed of this intellectual and spiritual curiosity which is a part of his nature, and which ever keeps him the tireless, insatiable inquirer after truth, the seeker after knowledge, the investigator into the hidden things, and the secret soul of things, in the universe. Naked of demonstration though he be, and all unclothed of absolute proofs of that which he seeks to know, he is more innocent in the knowledge of his ignorance than he was in the unconscious ignorance itself. He faces the traditional God without shame, the Church without shame, the dogmatism of science without shame; and he will fly to cover with fear of none of them. He patches up no fig-leaved excuses for his present lack of knowledge, but boldly says: "Though I am poor, I expect to become rich; though I am naked, I expect to become clothed. I rebel against all arbitrary limits. I demand the freedom which is my right. I demand to know all, and I will be patient but persistent in my search!"

This curiosity which aspires to find out God is certainly a worthy and sublime one, and constantly vindicates itself. It is the irrepressible demand of our intellectual and moral nature. We cannot come to anchor in this universe without Him; we drift on the tide of our restless yearnings and painful experiences until we make fast to the conviction that physical law is spiritual also, and that universal force is instinct with universal love and wisdom. We are worshipful and aspiring by nature; we want, therefore, to know God, in order that we may intelligently adore Him and make Him the perfect ideal towards which our actual may evermore strive. We need Him, moreover, as the missing link in that chain which shall bind all finite minds together as the offspring of one Infinite Mind. The fact of a common origin proves the truth of a common stock and a common destiny. We are sympathetic by nature. The aspiration which kindles in us is strengthened by the assurance that a like aspiration glows in the breast of another. A natural inquiry, and one that is also irrepressible, rises in us: "Is this inspiration in me and my brother deathless, or is it a spark which burns awhile and then dies?" Infinite in our origin, are we infinite in our destiny? This is a question which puts us on a new search, and gives a new edge to our curiosity. If the universe has a soul, has man also a soul, and are these two souls kindred? This impels us to study the nature of man in all its various manifestations, in all ages and countries; to inquire what he has thought and said and done; what have been his politics, his religion, his social laws and customs, from the beginning and under all circumstances. Our interest in the question about God does not, then, lessen or weaken, but rather stimulates and strengthens, our interest in the whole question about man. The spiritual significance of the material universe gleams back upon us, and we burn to respond with an intelligent and appreciative answer. One thrill runs round the whole circle; every soul feels it: it begins and ends in the central Soul of the universe.

We will be curious, then, about these sublime secrets. All that is concealed we long to know; all that is hidden we long to discover. We cannot allow the Bible, the Church, or men of science to seal up the book of revelation to us. Let the show proceed! Who knows what we shall see yet? Perhaps something better than any of us have expected. Shall we now have a scientific creed, just when we have resolved to repudiate the theological one? Shall we say to the Churchmen, "Your pope is dead!"—and to the men of science, "Long live your pope!" thus turning from one fetich to bow down to another? We believe in science, but not in that which is one-eyed; which has intellectual but no moral or spiritual perception. It takes two eyes, wide open, to sweep the whole field of earth and heaven, and gather in all the facts from all quarters. Have you not been able yet, my scientific friend, to put your finger on God, or the human soul? Then no more have you so far been able to put your foot on them! The most that you can now say is that you have not found them; but be careful that you do not say that they never can be found. The human mind and the human heart are both out a-hunting; they are not accoutred with superstition or mere childish faith, either: would it not be as well to wait and see what they bring back? Do you say that there is no need of God, and that everything is explained without him? Nay, then; but we say that there is all need of God, and that nothing is explained without Him! There is no "fact" which you can discover but hints at a greater one yet remaining for you. And what are all your mere "facts," standing by themselves and shorn of their subtile and deep significance? Dead, dry, and uninteresting are they; mere rubbish, not fit for storage. But string them now on a thread of meaning, one end of which is in your finite comprehension, and the other running off into the infinite; call that thread law if you will, but without failing to observe that it is full of suggestions of intelligence,—and then your "facts" immediately grapple the observer's attention with irresistible interest, because they become in his eyes the luminous hieroglyphics of one continuously-unfolding infinite thought and purpose. You do not surely say that you have no desire to be immortal? But has that desire itself no significance? Does it not contain so much as a hint of some possible realization? Well, then, we are not at liberty to despise even a hint of this sort; and no truly scientific man will despise it, for all such know full well the value of a hint received from Nature—how often it has led to grand and valuable discoveries. A hint is enough for the truth-loving mind; even by so dim a ray of light it is encouraged to begin its search; with a clew no greater than this it is emboldened to start out on the path of inquiry. It was only a hint falling from an apple tree that led Newton to discover the law of gravitation; only a hint floating in mid-ocean that stimulated Columbus to persevere in discovering this continent. Is not a hint from within as good as a hint from without? The law of love, that girdles the universe and matches the law of gravity, we will discover from a hint; the wonderful continent of the soul lying over against that of sense, fair with the flora of beautiful affections, and peopled with a noble race of aspirations,—this, too, we will discover from a hint. "Give me a great thought," said Herder, on his deathbed, "to refresh my spirit before I die." What thought so great or so refreshing as a thought of the infinite? It is one to the dimensions of which we may grow with our growth; its scope never narrows, but broadens and deepens as we proceed. The thought of immortality—how stimulating also is that! This low-roofed life where we sweat and toil and struggle, where we ache and weep and encounter disappointment, where our actual is dwarfed, our hope deferred, and our longing comes back to us unsatisfied,—the thought that this life is not all; that it is the beginning of a career which opens out into eternity, out into a broader, grander, fairer experience as we pursue it; that knowledge is cumulative for us without limits; that it is a prize waiting on the steps of our endless inquiry, the winning of which shall be our joy and our privilege forever; that the ideal is a star shining upon us from the infinite heavens, which we may not lose sight of when we stumble into the grave, but whose attraction is strong enough to draw us up out of the pit of death, and beckon us on into the far fields of the future,—is not this a thought so inspiring, that we shall hold on to it until we are compelled to part with it? If, in the last result, the truth requires us to dismiss these two great thoughts of God and immortality, then we will give them up—for the truth, whatever that may be, must contain for us the greatest comfort and the greatest inspiration.

But that time has not yet come. The last word on this subject still remains unspoken. We are passing through a period of criticism and negation now. We are stripping these thoughts of God and immortality of the husks which superstition had enveloped them in; we are tearing off the false masks in which the Bible and the Church have long presented them; we are denying the reality of the traditional God and the traditional heaven; we are striving to emphasize the truth of the reign of law, and to do justice to this life, so long neglected and despised by theology. This is a needful and necessary work. But the time is coming, when in regard to these matters, we shall want to do something better. I am confident that, after we have got through with our present negations, we shall have some grand affirmations to make about the Soul of the universe and the soul of man. They will be cleaner, sweeter, nobler, vaster than the old affirmations. They will reconcile the final decisions of the intellect and the continuous demands of the heart.

And that these aspirations may have full scope to grow, and freedom to gain utterance, no halt of thought in these directions must be called, no sneer must be flung at faith, no shame must be put on hope. Let the philosophic doubters grow not self-complacent, nor the scientific deniers hasten to assume that the last word is spoken. Religion is not moribund, nor is faith entirely obsolete. Though the "altar stairs" on which we stand be shrouded yet in darkness, it may be that we shall yet find they "slope through darkness up to God." The sun of truth hangs only on the horizon now; the wide, long dome of the heavens it has still to climb. Let us wait in patience, and see it ascend! As it slowly mounts upward, many facts and groups of facts it will bring into light, which now lie in the shadow, and whole broad fields of thought it will illumine, which yet no mind has discovered. Welcome every fact, welcome every thought, welcome every discovery! But welcome, also, the wise interpreter, the tireless thinker, the dauntless discoverer! Welcome Man, whose aim is the truth, whose vocation is the endless pursuit of knowledge!

THE CHURCHMAN AND THE UNITARIAN:

A CONVERSATION.

BY W. A. L., OF BRISTOL, ENGLAND.

Churchman.—Ah! it is the coming out at which one hesitates. There are moments when reason and duty say, Go; but the thought of leaving old friends and breaking away from old associations is such a serious obstacle to the throwing in of my lot with those whose opinions approximate my own, that I do not think I can go out.

Unitarian.—That is one of the evils (if evil it be) of gradual change. It must now be three years ago since I induced you first to study both sides of the theological question. How exceedingly "orthodox" you then were I well remember,—and how you almost indignantly rejected my offer to lend you Theodore Parker's Discourse on Religion. But fortunately Channing was a name so well known in connection with philanthropic movements, and his veneration (you called it something more) for Jesus was so profound, that you consented to look into his writings in order to see the force of the arguments which such an enthusiastic admirer of the Second Person in your Godhead could adduce for not according deity to him.

Churchman.—Three years ago! is it possible? However, as you know, I could not rest satisfied with Channing's resting point. The criticising faculty once allowed play, it demanded full play, and sheer logic carried me to pure theism.

Unitarian.—Yes, but it was the work of years; first one doctrine and then another was abandoned. If errors in the genealogies were discovered, if discrepancies in the narratives of events were unexplainable, how was it any longer possible for you to accept the dogma of doctrinal inspiration, when in such apparently trifling matters verbal inspiration had not been vouchsafed? And so you were led on from one point to another, till now you have come to regard the Bible as any other book and the Jews as any other people,—so far, I mean, as criticism is concerned.

Churchman.—And only so far; no one can deny that to the Jews belonged preëminently the genius for religion, in the same way as to the Greeks belonged the genius for the conception of the beautiful, and to the Romans the genius of martial glory and legislative ability.

Unitarian.—Exactly; while it is impossible to doubt that other nations have had most enlightened teachers, and also most exalted notions of the Supreme Being, yet it may be questioned whether, if regarded as a whole, the Christian Scriptures have ever been equalled, much less surpassed, in the purity of their ideas concerning God. But to return to the point: I was remarking that your change of opinion had been so gradual that, as each new truth was gained, a fresh compromise was made with your surrounding circumstances; had the change been sudden, you would have found too many points of difference to be reconciled easily and speedily, and you would have been compelled to leave the church to which you are so much attached.

Churchman.—There is truth in what you say; at first, too, the change was small. When I no longer believed it possible that God could condemn any one to eternal torment, I still could not but think that some at least would never attain eternal happiness; and before I yielded my consent to the "universal" doctrine, I had to reconcile my position as a member of the Anglican Church with my then slight departure from her supposed dogma. This was an easy matter; a slight change in my opinion of doctrine required but a slight change in my opinion of discipline, and hence the transition from orthodoxy to heterodoxy has been made, and I am still a member of an orthodox church.

Unitarian.—This, no doubt, is to be deplored. The free churches are not so numerous that they can well dispense with the influence which the countenance of the thousands who occupy a precisely similar position as yourself would exert. And, after all, wherein would the outward change, corresponding to your inward change, affect you? You say it is hard to leave old friends and break off from old associations. I grant it is; but surely no friend, deserving of the name of friend, would desert you; and, as for old associations, you will find many a congregation in our body whose general form of service would keep that tie intact, while its language would be more in accordance with your secretly cherished beliefs.

Churchman.—I am not so sure about real friends not deserting me. Do you not know that the odium theologicum is one of the worst and cruellest of hatreds—ignoring even the ties of relationship and of blood? As to the other point, what you say has no interest for me. Indeed, it is one of the curious things I can not understand—a church professing to be free, admitting that Truth has not yet been absolutely attained, permitting to her members the greatest freedom in inquiry and criticism, and yet allowing herself to be hampered with a liturgy.

Unitarian.—And a very beautiful liturgy it is, too. I am surprised at your finding fault with a liturgy, after you had expressed your unwillingness to part from old associations,—your liturgy being itself one of them!

Churchman.—Gently! You forget that my liturgy has been my companion from youth up; you have only adopted yours of late years. You profess to have no binding creed, yet I will undertake to extract from your various liturgies such a creed as shall astonish you,—astonish you, because I know perfectly well that many of its articles would be such as you would repudiate with horror.

Unitarian.—But we must not be too critical in such matters; regard these liturgies as poetry; consider them as part of the lessons. No one supposes that the Scripture narratives are wholly believed because the minister reads them from the desk; and just so with the printed services.

Churchman.—There I differ from you entirely. Where I am, I rest content; those parts of the church service I do not agree with I simply leave alone, and such conduct in no wise detracts from my pure enjoyment, nor does it interrupt my devotions. But were I now to join another church, out of strong conviction that she would be more of a home for me than the one I should leave, I should necessarily expect to find a service in the whole of which I could participate, and which would not be provocative of criticism. In our Litany we call ourselves "miserable sinners," and the words do not draw off my attention from the prayer in which I am engaged, in order to think whether I can honestly say them—simply because of old associations. But I do not think it is a healthy sign, or a sign of piety at all, to call oneself a sinner in some services and not in others, just because it is so written. There is not a single one of your services with which I could not find fault—with many of them seriously. As for your plea of poetry, I cannot entertain it. The prayers are by no means on the same footing as the lessons, and for these latter even I think the choice is much too limited at present. Prayer is the soul's sincere desire, and is communion with the God of Truth; but it is difficult to get oneself into "sincereness" with printed forms read in a certain order at stated intervals. It is difficult so to do even when the strength of old associations is with one; how much more difficult without such!

Unitarian.—But would you have extempore prayers? The curriculum of a university course does not tend to develop a faculty for this, and congregations must suffer if their minister is not up to the praying mark.

Churchman.—But a minister is at liberty to say what he likes in the pulpit; surely if he does not offend good taste there, he will not be likely to do so at the desk!

Unitarian.—Possibly not, but it is not so much a matter of good taste as of "grace."

Churchman.—Now you use orthodox phraseology. I must maintain, however, that it is a question of good taste and not of "grace," presuming that by grace you mean some divinely bestowed talent. Every one can pray, and pray in reality, too, but it is few who can do so aloud in such a manner that those who listen to them shall join in the prayer forgetful of him who prays. It requires a great deal of good taste to know just what to say and how to say it.

Unitarian.—You defined grace just now; if you will let me define good taste as common sense, simplicity joined with devout earnestness, I will admit you are right. Nevertheless, you astonish me by saying there are few who can pray extempore, and yet lament the adoption of printed forms of prayer by the free churches.

Churchman.—You partly mistake me; I do deprecate the adoption of printed forms of service most strongly, for I do not think they tend to real devotion, and there is in their use the ever-present notion of a creed. But I do not object to the minister using, if he pleases, printed or manuscript prayers. Only, of course, he should in such cases be very careful to use them as not using them. That is, he should read the prayers as though he was uttering them, in order not to provoke the criticism which anything printed is sure to raise.

Unitarian.—I think such a plan would answer, though I must say I have never regarded the subject in this light before.

Churchman.—I am sure it would; depend upon it, your churches, in adopting liturgies, have made a great mistake, and it will be discovered some day—perhaps when too late to repair the mischief. One of your ministers, referring to this subject lately, and admitting his own dislike to the liturgies, said: "I am myself uniformly accustomed to extempore prayer; yet after long experience, while I do not feel the value of it less to myself, I doubt more and more whether it is best for one's congregation. And often I feel it would be an infinite help to follow the lead of some one else's thought." But if he felt the value of extempore prayer to himself, he may rely upon my experience as a layman that it is of value to the congregation as well. If extempore prayer be impossible, let a minister by all means follow some other lead and prepare his prayers beforehand, or let him confine himself, if necessary, to ready printed forms; but so long as the prayers shall be extempore as far as the congregation is concerned, my object is gained.

Unitarian.—I must say good-night; but I will think over what you have said.

MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON EQUAL AND JUST TAXATION.

THIRD HEARING.

Mr. Richard Hallowell appeared before the committee with a written argument against church exemption, which he read. He claimed that churches had no more claim to immunity than the press or private educational institutions.

Mr. J. Thomas Stevenson appeared as a remonstrant against the petition, representing the Massachusetts General Hospital, which he claimed to be a strictly charitable corporation, from which members could receive no pecuniary benefit. He only objected to those clauses of the act particularly affecting the institution. The amount of property thus held in trust was $2,600,000—$1,950,000 in real estate and $650,000 in personal property—liable to an annual tax, should the repeal take place, of $38,000 for city purposes. This property was derived from subscriptions, donations, and legacies of benevolent individuals, varying in amount from twenty-five cents to $470,000—the latter a legacy of a Boston mechanic; $75,000 only being given by the State. This was held strictly in trust. But $916,000 of this property was income-producing to the amount of $61,600, $1600 of which had to be paid as annuities to relatives of donors. Should this property be taxed, but $22,000 would annually accrue for the benefit of the sick poor. The number of patients admitted and treated during the past twelve months was 15,217—505 of whom, only, were able to pay. The deficiencies were frequently large, this year $98,000, and had to be met by this income and voluntary contributions of individuals, no call ever being made upon the general public. He did not appear to prevent the taxation of a rich corporation, but to beg of the committee not to add to the burdens of an institution that had not now the means for doing what it was actually doing for the sick poor. He did not believe that the citizens of Boston in multitude assembled would approve of the repeal proposed, but they would respond with a unanimous "No!" that would shake, not only the dome of the State House, but the dome of the heavens. He closed with a fervent appeal for the continued exemption of the churches with their poor boxes, the hospitals with their sick beds, the homes for the aged, and the refuges for the penitent. Do not, he said, drive them back to their poverty-stricken homes for the mere purpose of slightly increasing the amount of taxable property.

Assistant Solicitor Stackpole then appeared on behalf of the city, and said that the city was greatly interested in the matter, as upon its settlement depended the prosperity of Boston. He then presented Mr. Hills, head Assessor of Boston, and before he gave way to Mr. Hills he desired to say that the City Hospital was a monument of the charity of the city as a corporate body. It had already cost $150,000, and $200,000 more would be expended. He thought sound judgment and not sympathy should decide the question. Taxation is inevitable, and the most just taxation is that which is the most equal. It is for the interest of the churches and charitable institutions that some modification of the present law should be made; for, if there is no change, the extreme to which the exemption will be carried will force a radical change which will be disastrous. Such was the lesson of the past, and the indications are that we are soon to see a repetition of that lesson. The laboring man will realize that the beautiful church built at almost unlimited expense comes indirectly from his earnings, and will sooner or later rebel against such a system. The barons of the olden time are reproduced in the barons of our railroads and stock exchanges, and both sought to erase their life's errors by leaving a proportion of their gains to charitable or religious institutions. The system of exempting church property originated when all churches were of simple construction, and of some equality in value. Should not, then, a limit be fixed at which exemption of such property should cease at present? And in relation to charities a similar limit should be fixed so that the proportionate value to the public should be a guide as to their exemption from taxation. Such limitation will prevent money from being foolishly spent and foolishly bequeathed.

Mr. Thomas Hills, chief Assessor of the City of Boston, then gave his views on the subject, saying that the real estate of Boston paid 65 per cent. of its taxes, and therefore the exemption of such property should be carefully considered. The exemption of the United States bonds had greatly added to the burdens on real estate, and the exemption of imported goods, while in the original packages, and in the hands of the original owners, takes $4,000,000 more of personal property from the taxation of the city. Should the present tendency of decisions by the courts be continued, the real estate of the city will be obliged to bear the entire burden of taxation. The exemption of Tremont Temple, Wesleyan Hall, and Congregational Building were instanced as the cause of $1,200,000 exempted property, and the Masonic Building is now under consideration as a subject for exemption as a charitable institution.

The decisions of the Supreme Court allow almost an unlimited exemption, and in 1870 sixteen wards of Boston had $10,400,000 exempt property, now increased to between $14,000,000 and $15,000,000. The increase of the total live taxable property during that time has been about 35 per cent., while the increase in the exemption list has been 40 per cent. A section of Brighton was shown to show a marsh of 71 acres, recently acquired by Harvard University, which had been given to it for educational purposes, and is deemed to be exempt from taxation. The Supreme Court has recently given a decision in the case of the New England Hospital vs. the City, that a vacant lot to be used in the future should be exempted, and other decisions are evidences that the claim may be sustained—the Benjamin Bussey case in West Roxbury, in which between 300 and 400 acres of land were left to Harvard College, with a life interest to his relatives, and the amount of this interest has been taken as the taxable value of the property. Upon annexation occurring, and the former estimate of the value being refused by the assessors of Boston, the life interest was relinquished, and the estate passed to Harvard College, thus completing the entire exemption of the property from all taxation.

He then referred to the estates occupied by Little, Brown, & Co., and an estate held in Dorchester by Harvard College, as cases which could not be exempted. The Martin Luther Orphan Asylum now holds the old Brook farm, of 139 acres, and upon it are some 22 orphans, this fact exempting the entire property. Mr. Hills closed his remarks by urging upon the committee his views as to where taxation was most oppressive, and endeavored to show that as the scale of prosperity descends, the difficulty of paying taxes ascends. He did not deny the good work of charities, but some board should pass upon their merits for exemption, and the State Board is eminently adapted to this work. Some amount should also be fixed as an exemption for churches. In the matter of educational institutions, the Board of Education should decide upon their merits as subjects for exemption, even giving the board control over Harvard College itself. Many profitable private schools are now exempt, and all benevolent societies should go to the Board of State Charities, and scientific schools should go to the Educational Board for decisions as to their claims for exemption. The hearing was then adjourned one week.—Boston Globe, February 27.

THE HELPLESS CLASS.

BY NATHAN SHEPPARD.

An old man, "decrepit and ill-clad" (so runs the story of a reporter of a daily paper), begged food and shelter of a police officer on one of the recent extremely cold and blustering days. He was sent (1) to "the County Agent's office," where he was informed that "they had no authority" to relieve him. He would find what he needed at (2) "the Union Street Station," but he found instead that "only criminals" could be entertained there, and as he was unfortunately not able to prove himself one of that class, he was ordered to report at (3) "the Chicago Avenue Police Station," about a mile and a half away. He arrived there almost exhausted of his little stock of strength, to be told again that (4) "the Union Street Station" was the place for him, and there he reported a second time, to be turned away a second time. Where he went then the reporter "does not know." He does know, however, that "this is now an everyday occurrence." Which is the same as to say the failure of government is an every-day occurrence, because the helpless appeal to it every day (and night!) in vain. And this is "free government," "local government," "self-government," and the like; not despotic or monarchical government, and the like.

This aged pauper probably belonged to the class which are helpless from no crime, fault, or improvidence of their own, unless they can be charged with the improvidence of being born—the most improvident thing they ever did in their lives! Multitudes of them are children who have no more responsibility for what they are, and where they are, than the carriage-horses which they envy. Even those who brought them into this world are not responsible for them. The society which made their existence, and their helplessness, inevitable—it is responsible for them. Society? What do we mean by society? We mean the whole body of the successful, the affluent, the comfortable and contented. It is answerable for the whole body of the hopelessly unsuccessful, the hopelessly helpless.

Society here means government, self-government, and self-government means society; for if there ever was a spot where "the people," alias the whole body of the successful, had everything their own way as respects government, this is that spot.

Now what disposition does this form of government make of its helpless class? It makes thieves, invalids, imbeciles of them; everything but valuable, or even harmless, citizens of them. What the mother country has been doing for centuries, this country has begun to do, with every promise of an abundant harvest of dragons' teeth. Both of these two forms of "free government" make criminals of the helpless, and entrap the impoverished into vice. So long as the helpless human creature is not a convicted felon, or a branded member of the fraternity of habitual criminals, he is let alone—let alone and watched! There is nothing he can do but steal, and only on condition of his doing that can he have the succor and shelter that he needs. Or he is cast out, and trodden down under foot, by the unanimous consent of a free people who repudiate the "paternal" form of government that would look after him, and glory in the fraternal form of government which Cain exercised over his brother Abel. And when this helpless victim of "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity" comes back, it is (as is often the case in London) not to ask employment, or even bread, but some punishment that will secure him both, or that will release him from the need of both. Everything is done to foster the chrysalis until it breaks its cocoon and spreads its wings—a moth to corrupt and destroy the very fabric of society.

The helpless class are better off in the United States than they are in the United Kingdom, because in the latter (for very obvious and natural reasons which it is unnecessary to recall here) they are incomparably more numerous and concentrated. They have not been able as yet to huddle themselves into such a mass of putrefaction, under the expanded wings of the eagle, as they have behind the uplifted legs of the lion and the unicorn.

But it is no more the deliberate design of the American republican, than it is of the English monarchical, form of government to help those who cannot help themselves. Neither of them care any more than the Priest or Levite did for those who are overcome of circumstances. Indeed, it is the boast of free government that it helps only those who can help themselves. It ostentatiously elbows aside the inefficient and incapable, and shouts on the efficient, the lucky, and the greedy. It makes two castes—the caste of the successful and the caste of the unsuccessful; and it makes the former as happy as the innocent, and the latter as miserable as the guilty. The gods of the heathen are idols; the idols of a democracy are self-made men.

An aristocratic form of society is only more rapid, it is not more certain, in the production of this result—the domination of the lucky over the unfortunate. England has three or four Lord Vanderbilts and Astors to our one, whether considered with reference to disproportionate wealth or inordinate influence; but with respect to grossly immoral ascendency, we have several hundreds if not thousands of Esquire Fisks, Goulds, and Tweeds, to England's one. Another difference suggests itself. The income of the marquis of Westminster (said to be a guinea a minute) was inherited; the income of these esquires of New York was accumulated by "self-made men." Such as these latter make themselves what they are; such as the former are made what they are by their ancestors. Both classes are indebted for their oligarchical preëminence to "free institutions."

Personal government is the only form of government that ever made any pretensions to helping those who cannot help themselves.

The despot acts from self-interest, of course. He fortifies his own palace by defending the peasant's hut. His system cannot survive "out-door" pauperism any more than out-door revolution. The beggar must be provided for, the idle catechised, the incapable compensated. In a word, there must be no helpless class to alarm society, lest they should imperil the throne.

Now, is it not as much to the interest of the republic, in the long run, as of the despotism, to prevent the formation and concentration of such a class? Is it not better for the republic, as well as for the despotism, to find a home for the homeless, and something to do for the unintentionally idle, than to wait until these develop into thieves, and maniacs, or murderers? Is not self-protection by means of prevention wiser than self-defence as cure, whatever may be the form of government? Naked children, starving old people, women exchanging virtue for bread, and so on, down, down the hideous list—these would be comparatively unknown if government were a help to the helpless as well as to the self-reliant.

As it is, philanthropy is doing spasmodically and clumsily what government should do constantly and systematically. The duty of the State is left to the charity of the impulsive. There is an occasional raid upon the emotions, an energetic boo-hooing and a vehement almsgiving. But as "nothing dries sooner than a tear," so nothing subsides sooner than an emotion. The wind dies away and the waters rest.

If we would only take warning from Great Britain! At the anniversary of the "Ragged School Union," you are informed amid vociferous applause that one in one thousand of the helpless little Arabs has been dug out of the mire, washed of its dirt, and taught the alphabet. Instead of the congratulations, and tea-drinking, and pathetic declamations, and vote of thanks to the chairman, over those that are rescued, there should be shame, shame, shame, nothing but shame, over the untouched masses of these children of the State. Instead of the driblets of "voluntary contributions" begged in sufficient amount to help the one in one thousand, there ought to be enough taxed out of (1) the excessively wealthy, and (2) the abundantly rich, to recover and educate the whole thousand. The pennies of inconstant pity are cast into the chasm which should be filled with the taxes of unemotional cupidity. How much of a tax on a hundred men from Vanderbilt down would be necessary to keep want and its attendant miseries and deviltries out of New York City?

But whence comes the right of government to lay such a tax? From the fact that these two excesses—excessive individual wealth and excessive individual poverty—are equally menacing to the stability of the State. Hence the right and the duty of the State to lay its restraining hand upon both—the right of self-defence. Instead of waiting for the mob to call on their (republican) lordships in the name of the Commune, we would spare their nerves, and their silver tea-sets, by sending the tax-gatherer in the name of a sagacious government; instead of the trembling hand of the obsequious missionary, the stern palm of inexorable authority.

What would be left for philanthropy, do you ask? Art, literature, morals, religion. More would be left for benevolence to do—far more than it would do.

Pauperism is a crime, but not a crime of the pauper. It is a crime of his governors—the whole body of the successful and contented. Ignorance is the blunder, not of its victims, who cannot help themselves, but of their rulers, who can help them if they will. It is in the power, and it is the province, of government, especially if it is municipal, to prevent both.

The paternal idea inheres in the very nature of government.—Chicago Advance.

BROTHERS' KEEPERS.

BY H. H.

Last June, the Massachusetts Legislature passed the following Act:—

"AN ACT for the better protection of neglected and destitute children.

"Section 1st.—The statutes relating to the appointment of guardians to minors are so amended as to authorize the appointment of a guardian who shall have the custody of any minor child, whose parents or surviving parent the Probate Court, upon a hearing, after such notice to the parents or surviving parent as the Court may direct, shall find to be unfit to have such custody.

"Section 2d.—This Act shall take effect on its passage.

"(Approved June 11*th*, 1873.)"

Such an Act as this should be on the statute book of every State, and humane people everywhere should make sure of its being no dead letter. It is high time that the barbarous tradition that a man may do as he likes with his own child be done away with. No crueller, falser doctrine ever gave shelter to tyrants. To form some idea of its effects, it is only necessary to read the newspapers of the day attentively. Hardly a day passes without the chronicling of some one act of cruelty on the part of a parent to a child; cruelty so excessive, so brutal, probably so fatal in its consequences, that it cannot be concealed from neighbors' observation, nor escape mention in the public journals. It is a startling statement to say that, to-day, children in America are killed by starvation, by poison, by burning upon hot stoves, by whipping, by exposure to cold—all at the hands of fathers or mothers. But this is true; and any one who will for one year carefully examine the newspaper records of this country, with this one point in mind, will be appalled at the statistics he will collect.

One day last winter, in a small New England city, a child died suddenly, and was as suddenly buried. It was the child of a mechanic, an industrious and hard-working man, of whom no positive ill was known, although he was not a man much in favor with his employers or neighbors. The family had moved into the place only a few years before.

Soon after the child's death rumors began to be circulated that he had died of starvation. A very little inquiry brought to surface a great amount of testimony as to the sufferings of this poor child and his two younger brothers. It was well nigh incredible that in any community such a state of things could have been allowed to go on, and no man, no woman, has been found to interfere to protect helpless children.

For months these little boys, aged about eleven, nine, and six, had been in the habit of eating greedily from the swill-pails in all the neighbors' yards. Kind-hearted people had called them into their houses and fed them. One grocery-man in the neighborhood had fed them regularly, and given them crackers to carry home. After a time the children were forbidden to go to that shop any longer. On being asked what had been done with the food given to them to carry home, they had said that their father had carried it away in his pail for dinner, and that the oldest boy had been severely whipped for asking for it.

The boy who died was a most unfortunate little creature, malformed in many ways, and an object of great aversion to the step-mother, who made a marked difference in her treatment of him and of the other two. Probably the child could not have lived many years under the most favorable circumstances, and no one could regard his death as anything but a blessing. Yet that he was killed by neglect, starvation, and exposure, was as certain as human testimony could make it.

His bed was one old comforter folded and laid upon the bare cords of a bedstead in the garret; the comforter reached so little way that his legs were on the cords. Another comforter was his only covering. Both were filthy beyond description. The other two children had a very good bed in the same garret.

All that was known of the little fellow's last night in this bed was his brother's story that in the night he asked them to go down stairs and bring him some water. They were afraid, and he said, "Never mind," he could "wait till morning." In the morning he did not answer when they spoke to him. When the step-mother reached the bed he was dying. Terror-stricken at last, she called for help to a woman who lodged on the floor below. The two women carried the dying child down stairs and laid him on his parents' bed.

Before a doctor could reach the house he was dead. The next day he was buried. All the testimony of the neighbors tended to show that the father was ignorant, or partially so, of the cruelty with which the child had been treated. For instance, the step-mother was evidently afraid that he would find out the truth as to the bed in which the poor little creature had been sleeping. She said to the woman who was helping her, "Pull down the comforter. Don't let his father see the cords."

This same woman had been in the habit of going familiarly into the rooms at all times, and it was from her that some of the most harrowing details were learned. Three or four days before the child's death he was sent out one morning into the yard to chop wood. It was bitterly cold, and an icy sleet was falling. The child had a racking cough, and had hardly strength to lift the axe. The mother was baking, and, growing impatient for more wood, sent one of the younger boys out to hurry his brother. The child came back saying that Arthur was "sitting on a log in the wood-shed, and he guessed he was dead; his eyes were shut."

The woman ran out, picked him up, brought him in, and, half throwing him into a hard chair, remarked impatiently that he was only shamming. The child's head fell heavily to one side, and his eyes were set. He had fainted. When he roused a little he cried bitterly for food. The mother threw to him some cold buckwheat-cakes. He ate them ravenously—"swallowing them almost whole, as if he hadn't had anything to eat for a week." He ate seven, one after the other, and still cried for more, which the mother refused to give him. This was only one of the many heart-breaking incidents which were told by eye-witnesses. It seemed as if the step-mother's own guilty conscience goaded her at last to involuntary accusations against herself. She told one of the neighbors that Arthur must have had a presentiment that he was going to die, for a few days before he had said to her:—

"Mother, if I die will you wear any black for me?"

"No, indeed," she replied, "you are not worth it."

"Well, won't you carry me to ——, and bury me by the side of my own mother?"

"No, indeed," was the reply to this question also; "that would cost quite too much money."

And yet the father, under cross-examination about the affair, testified that this child was idiotic, and had an idiot's impulse to eat waste food wherever he found it, whether he were hungry or not.

Strange questions those for an idiot boy to ask!

At last public sentiment ran so high that the town authorities took some semi-official action in the matter; the child's body was exhumed, and delivered to two physicians for examination. Their report was assumed by the parents to be an entirely exonerating one, by the town authorities to be sufficiently so to make it unwise for them to bring any suit in the matter. There was not "absolute proof that the child had died of starvation."

The city solicitor was a kindly man. Tears filled his eyes when he spoke of the poor child's fate. But city solicitors are legally bound to protect cities' interests. It is a costly thing for a city to lose a suit which involves the gravest accusations against a citizen's character. Juries have an inexplicable antagonism against anything which looks like interfering with a man's right to the privacy of his own house, even if he avail himself of the shelter of that privacy to torture every living creature belonging to him. This very solicitor not long before had failed to secure the conviction of a man who had beaten a horse to death. The failure was from no lack of testimony. Nothing except having had the horse beaten to death in the very court-room could have been stronger. But the wily lawyer of the defence said: "A pretty pass we're coming to, if any sentimental, idle gentleman who chooses can stand on the street and tell us how we're to manage our balky horses." And the jury said, "Ay, ay; we'll teach them that a man's master of his own;" and the case was lost.

Probably it would have been the same in this instance; and the moral effect of an acquittal would have been so bad that the city solicitor was no doubt human as well as wise in refusing to advise a prosecution.

So poor little Arthur's skeleton was laid back in the grave, and the men and women who had worked in vain to bring his murderers to punishment tried to comfort their aching and indignant hearts by the thought of his blessed release.

I have told this story thus minutely because it is such a good illustration of the need in all communities of an Act like the one quoted in the opening of this article.

Let it be remembered that these incidents occurred not among the lowest poor, who may be supposed to be brutalized by suffering, and almost driven by need to starve their children, but in the family of a well-to-do workman, a man able to buy carpets for his floors, and luxuries of food for his table.

It cannot be doubted that similar tragedies are going on all about us, perhaps at our very doors.

Had the Massachusetts "Act for the better protection of neglected and destitute children" been in force in the State where these things happened, it would have been an easy and short process to remove the two surviving children from the care of that brutal woman. We are every day passing new acts and perfecting new machinery for the protection of dumb animals. Are not children of more value than many sparrows?

When our brothers' blood cries from the ground, will it avail us to say, "Are we their keepers?"—Christian Union.

THE HORRORS OF VIVISECTION.

How few facts of immediate considerable value to our race have of late years been extorted from the dreadful sufferings of dumb animals, the cold-blooded cruelties now more and more practised under the authority of Science!

The horrors of Vivisection have supplanted the solemnity, the thrilling fascination, of the old unetherized operation upon the human sufferer. Their recorded phenomena, stored away by the physiological inquisitor on dusty shelves, are mostly of as little present value to man as the knowledge of a new comet, or of a Tungstate of Zirconium; perhaps to be confuted the next year; perhaps to remain as fixed truth of immediate value,—contemptible, compared with the price paid for it in agony and torture.

For every inch cut by one of these experimenters in the quivering tissues of the helpless dog, or rabbit, or Guinea-pig, let him insert a lancet one-eighth of an inch into his own skin; and for every inch more he cuts let him advance the lancet another eighth of an inch; and whenever he seizes, with ragged forceps, a nerve or spinal marrow, the seat of all that is concentrated and exquisite in agony, or literally tears out nerves by their roots, let him cut only one-eighth of an inch further,—and he may have some faint suggestion of the atrocity he is perpetrating, when the Guinea-pig shrieks, the poor dog yells, the noble horse groans and strains—the heartless vivisector perhaps resenting the struggle which annoys him.

My heart sickens as I recall the spectacle at Alfort, in former times, of a wretched horse, one of many hundreds, broken with age and disease resulting from life-long and honest devotion to man's service, bound upon the floor, his skin scored with a knife like a gridiron, his eyes and ears cut out, his teeth pulled, his arteries laid bare, his nerves exposed and pinched and severed, his hoofs pared to the quick, and every conceivable and fiendish torture inflicted upon him, while he groaned and gasped, his life carefully preserved under this continued and hellish torment, from early morning until afternoon—for the purpose, as was avowed, of familiarizing the pupil with the motions of the animal. This was surgical vivisection on a little larger scale, and transcends but little the scenes in a physiological laboratory. I have heard it said that "somebody must do this." I say, it is needless. Nobody should do it. Watch the students at a vivisection. It is the blood and suffering, not the science, that rivets their breathless attention. If hospital service makes young students less tender of suffering, vivisection deadens their humanity, and begets indifference to it.

In experiments upon the nervous system of the living animal, whose sensibility must be kept alive, not benumbed by the blessed influence of anæsthesia, a prodigal waste of suffering results from the difficulty of assigning to each experiment its precise and proximate effect. The rumpled feathers of a pigeon deprived of his cerebellum may indicate not so much a specific action of the cerebellum on the skin, as the more probable fact that the poor bird feels sick. The rotatory phenomena, once considered so curious a result of the removal of a cerebral lobe, were afterwards suspected to proceed from the struggles of the victim with his remaining undamaged and unpalsied side. Who can say whether the Guinea-pig, the pinching of whose carefully sensitized neck throws him into convulsions, attains this blessed momentary respite of insensibility by an unexplained special machinery of the nervous currents, or a sensibility too exquisitely acute for animal endurance? Better that I or my friend should die, than protract existence through accumulated years of torture upon animals whose exquisite suffering we cannot fail to infer, even though they may have neither voice nor feature to express it.

If a skilfully constructed hypothesis could be elaborated up to the point of experimental test by the most accomplished and successful philosopher, and if then a single experiment, though cruel, would forever settle it, we might reluctantly admit that it was justified. But the instincts of our common humanity indignantly remonstrate against the testing of clumsy or unimportant hypotheses by prodigal experimentation, or making the torture of animals an exhibition to enlarge a medical school, or for the entertainment of students, not one in fifty of whom can turn it to any profitable account. The limit of such physiological experiment, in its utmost latitude, should be to establish truth in the hands of a skilful experimenter, with the greatest economy of suffering, and not to demonstrate it to ignorant classes and encourage them to repeat it.

The reaction which follows every excess will in time bear indignantly upon this. Until then, it is dreadful to think how many poor animals will be subjected to excruciating agony, as one medical college after another becomes penetrated with the idea that vivisection is a part of modern teaching; and that, to hold way with other institutions, they, too, must have their vivisector, their mutilated dogs, their Guinea-pigs, their rabbits, their chamber of torture and of horrors, to advertise as a laboratory.—Prof. Henry J. Bigelow, M.D., in an Address before the Massachusetts Medical Society, June 7, 1871.

[NOTE.—The Catholic Review gives us another phase of this interesting question. It says: "Mr. Bergh ought to go to Florence, Italy. There has been a trial on hand in that city against a certain Von Schiff, Professor of Natural Physiology at the Royal Institute. It would appear that persons living in the vicinity of that establishment have been of late terribly disturbed by the horrible cries of dogs tortured by the professor in the most cruel manner, to satisfy his scientific curiosity by experiments in vivisection. In less than six months this monster had killed, inch by inch, no less than seven hundred of these unfortunate animals, given over to him by the Florentine municipality, which issued instructions to the public to send to the professor all vagrant dogs found wandering in the streets. Schiff was, of course, acquitted; for he was not even brought up on a charge of cruelty, but only as causing a nuisance. Vivisection was most positively forbidden by the Pope in all the anatomical schools of his dominions, but in regenerated Italy it is considered quite the thing. Conduct like Schiff's ought to turn him out of any institute, but the Florentine Government actually sends him his victims."]

THE INDEX has been greatly improved since its removal to Boston. It is more brilliant, more versatile, more popular. We need not say that its hostility to the Religious Amendment and the Christian religion is as uncompromising and consistent as ever.—Christian Statesman.

THE TRUE GOD.

Night overshadowed Abraham
Upon the Eastern plain,
And in the sky one pale, white star
Shed its soft, silver rain;
But unto Abraham it seemed
A kind and watchful eye,
Looking upon his loneliness
In pity from on high.

Kindled with wonder and with love,
He viewed the star o'er-head;
And from a pleased and grateful heart
"Thou art my God!" he said;
Slowly the star sank out of sight,
And Abraham was dismayed—
When, lo! within the steadfast heavens,
The moon her shield displayed.

Over the dark and lonely plain
Her radiance gently fell,
And Abraham's sorrowing, weary heart
Confessed her peaceful spell.
"Thou art my God!" in joy he cried—
"Thy light my spirit fills;"
But, as he spoke, the sinking moon
Set o'er the distant hills.

Then Abraham in sorrow said,—
"My God could not forget;
But Thou hast left me in the dark;
I like not those who set."
At last the dark hours passed away,
The sun unclouded shone,
Resplendent as a risen soul
In glory all its own.

The splendor dazzled Abraham's eyes,
And, prostrate in the dust,
"Thou art my God!" aloud he cried,—
"All-powerful, radiant, just."
He worshipped it throughout the day,
Till, in a flood of light,
Beyond the far horizon's rim,
It disappeared from sight.

Then Abraham, pondering in the dark,
Questioned his longing soul,
Till into his benighted mind
A ray of reason stole.
"Farewell, ye orbs of light," he said,—
"Ye'r but of mortal birth;
I'll turn my face to Him who made
The heavens and the earth."

GLIMPSES.

The "Congressional Petition" foots up in all 3,952 names; the "Massachusetts Petition," 7,779.

A well-known sage of New England is reported to have once defined Life as "the concentration of the identities and the dispersion of the individualities." There's a nut for you to crack!

The last words of Mohammed, according to Bishop Ferrette (a very radical preacher with a very conservative title), were—"Yes, the blessed companionship on high!" A noble dream, if it means the perpetuation of a blessed companionship begun here and now.

Signatures to the "Congressional Petition" for taxation of church property have been received since last week as follows: From the Banner of Light, Boston, Mass, 207 names; Hiram Phillips, Mansfield, Mass., 19; John Cosgrove, Soldiers' Home, Washington, D. C., 1. Total for the week—227 names.

Signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition" since last week have been received as follows: From the Banner of Light, 205 names; from R. H. Ranney, Boston, 90; from Edward W. Blake, East Cambridge, 84; from D. M. White, Taunton, 40; from F. M. Vaughan, Middleboro, 88. Total for the week—507 names.

"Selfish and contentious people," says Mr. Darwin [Descent of Man, vol. II., p. 156], "will not cohere, and without coherence nothing can be effected." There is no greater need to-day to the cause of true radicalism than coherence, or organization for carrying out radical principles to their consummation in a higher social state.

Rev. Dr. Miner, pastor of the Second Universalist Society in this city, at the close of a sermon in defence of the exemption of churches from taxation, declared that the whole question was one of "God in the Constitution." We agree with him. No one who favors church-exemption can logically refuse to favor the principles of the Christian Amendment party.

Quoting Bismarck's dictum that the Catholic Church is "a body within the State seeking to overthrow the State," Prof. Gould (Baptist) recently remarked that to restrain the Catholic Church was "not persecution, but political safety." Let the remark be remembered when the Evangelical Protestant Church needs to be restrained. "Nomine mutato, de te fabula narratur."

Rev. Dr. Peabody, preacher to Harvard University, recently delivered a discourse the object of which was to prove that Christianity and science rest on evidence of the same nature, and must stand or fall together. Such attempts are incidental to the progress of the age. But it takes a marvellous capacity for the obliteration of distinctions to maintain ground so paradoxical.

Speaking of Mohammedanism in Africa, the Baptist Watchman and Reflector says: "Two things are certain, namely, if Christianity is to subdue Africa to itself, it has got to do it against a mighty and enterprising rival, which has already an immense advantage, and means to use it, and that it cannot do this by the efforts now being put forth." Little by little the Christian Church is coming to perceive the utter inability of its missionary system to compass "the conversion of the whole world to Christ."

This is the way in which Judge Spofford, of Hillsborough, Ohio, granted an injunction against the "praying bands" on the application of a saloon-keeper: "When such worship is made a pretext of breaking up a man's lawful trade; of interfering with the quiet and peaceable enjoyment of his own property; of bringing him into public ridicule and disgrace; of defaming his calling and character, and this without intermission for six consecutive weeks in the storms and colds of winter, creating heart-burnings among neighbors, defamation of private character, and an unsettled state of society—that, sir, is a nuisance."

Here is a bit of wisdom, hidden in an anecdote which Mr. R. Wilkin, of Cadiz, Ohio, contributes to The Index: "My seven-year-old nephew, being instructed by his mother not to be so petulant and boisterous when he could not have things his own way, but to be calm and ask God to help him, was soon after outrageously provoked at a swelled door that would not open by his utmost efforts. He bethought himself to try his mother's plan and ejaculated, 'God, I wish you would open this door for me!' Then, giving the door another desperate pull, it flew open; whereupon he hastily exclaimed, 'O, you need not mind it; I can do it myself.' "

"The Mohammedan population in India numbers at least thirty millions. It is estimated that one-third of the population of Bengal (sixty-six millions) is Mohammedan. There is, therefore, a larger field of labor among the followers of the false prophet in India than in the Turkish Empire itself, where the Mohammedans number only about sixteen or seventeen millions. In India Mohammedanism is full of life, and has recently passed through what may be called a revival, whereby the number of the followers of Islam have been greatly increased, and their adherence to Mohammedan practice has become more rigid. As an instance of their devotion to their faith, it is mentioned that an eloquent Moulvi (doctor of divinity), who had come from Mecca, raised within a few weeks $50,000 for the erection of a grand mosque in Serampore; and that this was the fifth grand mosque, besides a score of smaller ones, he had caused to be erected since his return from Mecca, five years before."—Independent.

Yet Rev. Dr. Clarke, in his Ten Great Religions, makes absolutely no allusion to the immense contemporary activity of Mohammedan conversion in Asia and Africa, speaks of this religion as "arrested,"—"its time is almost passed"—"it has everywhere made subjects, not converts." Why not look facts in the face?

T. W. H.

The New York Tribune of February 25 had the following notice of the action of Congress with reference to the petition in behalf of the Christian Amendment: "The House Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of E. G. Goulet and others, asking Congress for 'an acknowledgment of Almighty God and the Christian religion' in the Constitution of the United States, having considered the matter referred to them, have reported: That upon examination even of the meagre debates by the fathers of the Republic in the Convention which framed the Constitution, they find that the subject of this memorial was most fully and carefully considered, and then in that Convention decided, after grave deliberation, to which the subject was entitled, that, as this country, the foundation of whose government they were then laying, was to be the home of the oppressed of all nations of the earth, whether Christian or Pagan, and in full realization of the dangers which the union between Church and State had imposed upon so many nations of the Old World, with great unanimity that it was inexpedient to put anything into the Constitution or form of government which might be construed to be a reference to any religious creed or doctrine; and they further find that this decision was accepted by our Christian fathers with such great unanimity that in the amendments which were afterward proposed, in order to make the Constitution more acceptable to the nation, none has ever been proposed to the States by which this wise determination of the fathers has been attempted to be changed. Wherefore your Committee report that it is inexpedient to legislate upon the subject of the above memorial, and ask that they be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that this report, together with the petition, be laid upon the table."

POOR NELLIE!

A few weeks ago Nellie Weeman, a sewing and nurse girl in the family of Judge Smith, of Springfield, Mass., committed suicide by taking chloroform. The poor girl seems to have had an excellent character, and to have been driven to the desperate deed by persistent unkindness in her own home, to escape which she had sought service abroad. She had joined the Baptist Church, and tried with poor success to get comfort and strength out of her religion. Some letters which we copy below from a Springfield paper without correcting their little errors, lest we spoil their pathos, would touch the hardest heart with tender commiseration. It is necessary to state that the Mr. Cass referred to is the Baptist pastor, and Mr. Phelps is a Sunday-school teacher at the Central Methodist Church. The last thought of the poor girl was for "dear little Bessie," the child of her employers that was entrusted to her care. Here are the letters:—

December 9, 1873.

Mrs. Smith,—I have got tired of life. I do not care to live in this world any longer. If this catches your eyes, forgive me. I came home from Sabbath school, this afternoon, entirely depressed in spirit; everything seemed to go wrong; they all seemed to shun me. Then I formed a purpose in my mind, that, if I could not be taken out of the world any other way, that I would take myself out. I know it is an awful thing. My life has been one continual warfare with myself and the world; that, I tell you, over and over again: and the only thing that troubles me now—will God forgive me? Oh, Mrs. Smith, pray for my soul! Dear, darling little Bessie. Oh, how much I love her. Can you blame me when you think how much I have been through,—17 years nothing but strife and troubles to look back upon. Oh, how many times I have felt the want of a true Christian mother; one that I could tell every thought and feeling without restraint, and, even though thousands of miles apart, still I would have consolation of knowing I had mother love and feel for me. Oh, why did God give me a fate like this. I know I have not made the world better for being in it; and, when I see the suffering all around me, and still I am spared, and wonder why he does not take me—when those that are loved with all that human hearts can give them, and they are taken and I am left, when gladly I would take their places. Just a week ago, to-day, I stood up before the world and promised to love and serve him the rest of my days. What will the world think I meant, just what I said. I meant to keep my promise, and I declare to you, to-night, as God hears me, that I love him to-night, and I hope to see him. I know this is a very pleasant world to most of them, yet it never has been to me. You have been a very kind friend to me ever since I have been under your care; yet, still, I could not feel towards you as I could to an own mother, if I had been blessed with one. You were far above me in social life; and, what was I? nothing but a poor sewing girl.

February 3, 74.

Mrs. Smith,—Will you please send my things Home, all that I have and all that has been given to me, and will you please give that disciphyline, you know that book that Mr. Cass got for me, as all of my folks are baptists, and it would not do them any good, and He can give it to some one else, if you please return it to him. Father's address is Joseph Weeman, 87 Broad st Lynn, Mass., send for him and he will do all. I am so tired, so weary of this life. I have done everything to get sick but I cant, so I am going to try another way. I believe the Devil himself has got hold of me lately, even Jesus has left. Oh I had such peace when I first Joined the church, but it has all left me and it will not come back. Oh I have tried so hard to be a good girl and try to live a christian life but it has been impossible. I could not do it and had to give it up. Oh, I hope that no one may feel as have theese last 2 weeks. I have gone to church night after night, hoping to get benefitted. Mr. Phelps, as I told you, talked with me last night, and tried to have me give myself to Jesus again, and said he would pray for me. God Bless Him, but I could not, there was a something that prevented. I do not know what it was, but I could not help it. Will you forgive me in the step I am about to take, let me have the forgiveness of one person on this earth. I felt Sunday all that I said to you about the church and other matters. Pray for me. I love dear little Bessie.

Nellie Weeman.

Now for the saddest part of this sad story. A correspondent in Springfield, who enclosed to us a newspaper slip containing the above letters, adds: "When a poor, unfortunate girl, driven from her home amongst strangers, and feeling as if she had no one to care for her or love her, told the Judge in whose family she worked that she had a terrible load upon her, this same Judge related the fact at an evening prayer-meeting, telling the audience how troubled one in his family was, and saying that God had probably placed this load upon her to try her. 'At this one of the good brothers cried out, 'Bless God for the load!'—and hoped they would all pray to have the load put upon her heavier. That same night the poor girl made away with herself, all for the want of kindness and a little human-nature."

While the Church prays that the load may be put heavier on suffering souls, in the vain delusion that God wills pain to man for his own glory, let all who breathe the spirit of a better religion join hands to lift it off,—join hearts to save each other from such piteous despair,—join heads to bring to all mankind the light of emancipating truth, which alone can show the uselessness and the cruelty of such horrible superstition.

GENERAL BENEFITS NO GROUND FOR EXEMPTION.

Mr. Abbot having already defined the principles that underlie the demand for "Just and Equal Taxation," it remained for others to deal with special claims for exemption made by various institutions. Accordingly on February 25, at a public hearing granted by the Joint Special Committee of the Massachusetts Legislature, before whom Mr. Abbot and others had appeared, I submitted the following remarks, limiting myself to a demand for church taxation, and more particularly to a consideration of the popular theory upon which the Church now enjoys exemption. R. P. H.

The most plausible argument in favor of church exemption from taxation, the argument upon which its advocates rely, is to be found in the supposed character, the aims and objects, of church organizations. The theory of general taxation, the principle upon which all property is taxed, is freely admitted on both sides; but it is urged that the Church must be excepted from the application of this theory, because it is the guardian of the morals of the State, an educational institution; it acts, it is said, as a moral police, more efficient than any physical force we can bring to bear against vice and crime.

Now, granting all this to be substantially true, church-exemptionists have yet to prove their case. Is the Church the only institution of society that has protected and developed social welfare? If it is, I am willing to admit that its special claims are entitled to very serious consideration, if not to actual approval; but if it is not, the State can only listen to such claims in order to reject them, and if, by previous legislation, they have been recognized, reform must speedily be made. If, on the other hand, you admit the argument to be sufficient, it follows inevitably that other institutions must also be exempt, provided they can show an equal power, or a power approximating to that of the Church, in accomplishing the same end.

For example, not a few people, and especially proprietors and editors of newspapers, will confidently claim that the press is quite as potent in its influence upon the community as the Church can possibly be. A demand for exemption coming from the religious press must appeal with irresistible directness to every one who advocates church exemption upon the grounds I am considering.

But there is another institution that is even more powerful than the press,—an institution which many, even church devotees, will probably concede exerts an equal influence with the Church in laying the foundations of good government and in guaranteeing the best interests of society, the best social development. I refer now to the institution of private schools. In the report of the State Board of Education for 1873, the number of unincorporated academies and private schools in the State, reported by school committees of various cities and towns, is 463; and the annual cost thereof is $423,186.50. As some of the towns fail to make any report upon the subject, it is safe to say that the actual number of such schools largely exceeds the number given. The same report estimates the number of these schools in the city of Boston at 97, maintained at a cost of $238,631.00. This estimate is also probably below the true one.

Now these schools undoubtedly differ from the schools of the Church, from the Sunday-schools, in their mode of teaching; but no one will be reckless enough to deny their immense influence for good upon the community at large, in other words upon the State, that levies a tax upon them, upon their property used for educational purposes, as rigorously as it does upon the lowest grog-shop or the most luxurious saloon. Education at these schools may be called secular; but with the study of the sciences, of history and literature, every one of them professes to unite the moral code. By example and by precept the teachers aim to inculcate good morals, to institute good manners, to teach the golden rule of religion, to prepare the students in every way to become valuable members of society and good citizens of the Commonwealth.

Shall these schools, after maintaining themselves without aid from the State, be compelled to pay a tax in support, not of public schools, but of the schools of sectarian churches?

That is the question for you to consider. If we compare the two, it is by no means sure that the private school will not be found to be more efficient for the purposes of the State than the sectarian Sunday-school. It is true, a larger number of children frequent the Sunday-schools; but it must not be forgotten that, while these are in session two, or at the most three, hours of the week, their rivals in our comparison devote at least thirty hours of the week to the cause of education.

Again: as a general rule, our private schools exclude theology from their curriculum, while, as an invariable rule, the Sunday-schools teach theology. I stated to your committee at a previous hearing, and I repeat it now, that the law we seek to repeal invests every exempted church with full authority to devote every dollar thus contributed to it by the State to the exclusive propagation of theological dogmas and sectarian tenets, and therefore in its spirit, indeed in its effect, it violates the organic law of the Commonwealth, by which Church and State are to be kept, not only separate, but forever independent.

To what extent this money is thus appropriated no one can know; but that a large part of it is thus expended, everybody knows. The Roman Catholic Church, so far from being an educational institution in any broad sense, subordinates every branch of study to the enforcement of its own dogmas. The editor of the New York Nation asserts that this Church "does not encourage the study of natural science anywhere. Mathematics and astronomy she looks on with some favor, though we do not know how the spectroscope may have affected her towards the latter. There are no pious Catholic scientific men of any note, and never will be, if the Catholic clergy can help it." The same authority says that "Cardinal Cullen has maintained, in a paper edited by him in Rome, that the earth stands still." The Pope's Bull of Oct. 12, 1870, consigns to everlasting damnation all persons who possess or read any of the following books: Bacon's De Augmentis, Gibbon's Rome, Combe's Phrenology, Robertson's Charles V., Montaigne's Essays, Raspail's Chimie Organique, Montesquien's Esprit Des Lois, and Botta's History of Italy. Other masterpieces of modern literature, historical and scientific, are condemned; but these cited by the Nation suffice to confirm my statement, that the Roman Catholic Church is not in any degree catholic in its educational methods; it sacrifices all of history, all of literature, all of science, that conflicts with the theory of its own infallibility. The attitude of this Church toward popular education is at once dogmatic and hostile. In 1864, the Pope anathematized and condemned every one who maintains that "the best theory of civil society requires that popular schools open to the children of all classes, and generally all public institutes intended for instruction in letters and philosophy, and for conducting the education of the young, should be freed from all ecclesiastical authority, government, and interference, and should be fully subjected to the civil and political power, in conformity with the will of rulers and the prevalent opinions of the age." The avowed object of this Church, you will observe, is to bring all education into conformity with its own theories; beyond this, it is an enemy to education; and yet, by the operation of the law we are here to discuss, it receives material and important pecuniary aid from the State, double and perhaps quadruple the aid contributed to any other religious sect. In its Sunday-schools, teaching is limited mainly to prayers to the Virgin Mary and other saints, and instruction in the Catechism.

In other sectarian organizations, we find that, in what I may call the heterodox Sunday-schools, such as Unitarians and Universalists, secular education is combined in a very limited degree with moral or religious and theological instruction. Theology is more or less prominent in all of them.

Attached to the Protestant Evangelical sects, it is estimated that there are about 1300 Sunday-schools in the State, of which 115 are located in Boston. Instruction in these schools is in part moral or religious, but is in great excess purely theological and doctrinal. In all of them the Bible is the only text-book. Each sect teaches its own peculiar tenets, while all of them condemn heterodoxy as something to be avoided and shunned. I do not propose to enter into any discussion of the various doctrines insisted upon by one sect of the Christian Church only to be denounced by another sect. Such discussion would be out of place here. The question is not, "What theology is taught?" but, "Is it right for the State to contribute toward the propagation of any especial doctrine?" If institutions are to be relieved from taxation upon the plea that they conserve the morals and increase the intelligence of the community, which are the better entitled to relief?—those that promote these ends solely, such as private schools, or those whose principal object is to secure the perpetuation of certain religious creeds? The present management of our public schools, by which, though the Bible is read, no doctrinal instruction is permitted, indicates very clearly the popular estimate of the importance of withdrawing the support of the State from all sectarianism. The Church cannot be allowed to engraft itself upon the State. It has perfect right to claim protection, but not endorsement, not pecuniary support.

I have instituted a comparison between private schools and Sunday-schools, and I might, perhaps, with equal force, show that the lyceum rivals, if it does not excel, the pulpit in its influence upon morals and social progress, and that therefore it has an equal title to exemption. No one will dispute that the lyceum reaches a much larger number of the people. Our churches are in session once or twice in the week, while the lyceum is in almost constant session. Our church-pews are comparatively deserted, while our lecture-rooms overflow with auditors. Without, however, touching further upon this suggestion, I commend it to your careful consideration.

I have attempted to show you, Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Committee, that the argument relied upon by church-exemptionists is insufficient, for the reason that, so far from being exceptional in its moral influence, the Church has several competitors for distinction in that direction,

I have shown you that, just where it begins to be exceptional, just there it cannot stand the comparison made between it and other institutions. As compared with the press, with the lyceum, and especially with the private school, when it asks that the public shall be taxed for its support, its claims are exceptionally weak; for these institutions are largely free from the objection the tax-payer will necessarily raise, that is, theological instruction; while the Church, or at least the sect, can only live by giving such instruction.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that a discussion of religious doctrines would be out of place here. You would very properly rule me out of order, were I to enter upon such a discussion. You do not demand of me whether I am a Roman Catholic, an Evangelical Protestant, a Unitarian, or a Universalist. I may be Christian or Jew, Mohammedan or Buddhist. You do not know, you do not care. As either one or the other, I have no claim upon you, no right to be heard; but as a citizen of the Commonwealth, I have a right, and exercise my right, to speak. Now it seems to me that, as I should be out of order in coming here the advocate of a special form of religion, for the same reason special religious institutions, all religious institutions, are out of order, when they go to the State and demand support,—the rich organization with a property worth $500,000 demanding $6000 or $8000; and the poor organization with a $5000 property getting only $600 or $700. As between the sects, there is little justice in such an arrangement; and as between the Church and the Commonwealth, there is no justice at all—I ask, therefore, that Church property be compelled to pay its quota to the State, and that the law that not only violates the rights of the sects as between each other, not only violates the rights of every member of the community, but violates also the organic law of the Commonwealth,—I ask that such a law may no longer mar the statute book.

PHILOSOPHY IN THE WEST.

We have received a very full report in the St. Louis Democrat of Mr. William T. Harris' lecture on "The Relation of Religion, Art, and Philosophy," delivered before the University Club of St. Louis.

This lecture is marked by the same high ideal perception, broad generalization, and calm, dispassionate judgment of other systems of thought and faith, which always characterize Mr. Harris' writings; but it seems more comprehensive in its grasp of thought, more clear in its style, and nearer to the daily consciousness of human nature, than usual. It gives much food for meditation on all the intellectual problems of the age, and shows the commanding thoughts which unite differing and seemingly opposite tendencies.

We shall not attempt to give a condensed sketch of an essay already so condensed in thought and expression that every sentence might be expanded into pages, but will rather give one or two brief extracts of the more practical applications which may interest our readers to try for themselves the path which he points out, as leading to deeper insight into the problems of life, and a possible reconciliation of its seeming contradictions.

Of course, our brief extracts will not do justice to the whole scheme of the lecture, but they may attract attention to it, as showing how the most abstract mental philosophy is brought to bear upon the questions that agitate society:—

"In this law of recognition, wherein the truly positive results of the world are achieved, we have the key to the principle of combination and the solution of spiritual might in the universe. Combination is the great principle of spirit, and its forms are numerous in the practical world, and in the theoretical world as well. By combination into society man is enabled to conquer Nature. The aggregate of individuals can achieve a victory where a multitude of single attacks have failed. The institution of civil society is the first form of the living miracle of combination. . . . By division of labor, each individual is set to work, not directly for his own gratification, but directly for society. What the laborer produces must go to the market, and be sold to others. What the laborer needs himself must be obtained in the market from others. Thus each individual is engaged in serving others. . . . In civil society each man toils for his fellow-men, and receives his recognition therefore in the symbol of social obligation, which is money. Money is universal solvent of property, and with it the laborer makes his demand upon the fund of labor collected by society, and receives the satisfaction desired."

All that he says of the relation of science and religion is of profound interest, but it is too long to extract,—and we shall close with a word of advice which he gives to readers:—

"Let no one think to get what is called insight, in one week's reading of a profound thinker. If one reads once per week some profound writer, spending his hour or two over a single page, and then lays by his book to take it up again a week later, and to turn again and again to the same book, he will find after a year that he begins to see the difference between the daylight of insight which illumines all things, and the smoky torchlight of the understanding which throws an uncertain glare over things lying near it, and obscures more remote things by its smoke." E. D. C.

EDITORIAL MARAUDING.

Mr. Frothingham called attention, in THE INDEX of January 22, to the "base editorial ethics, bad enough in the secular press, but far worse in the 'religious,'" which usually govern editors in the matter of acknowledging mistakes they may have made. We are sorry to see a new illustration of the truth of his strictures in a quarter whence we had hoped better things. Our readers will remember that, in THE INDEX of February 5, certain pretentious claims put forth by Old and New were noticed as follows:—

"In Old and New for February, 1874, we find the following astounding assertions: 'Mr. Josiah P. Quincy's papers in Old and New, on the Present System of Exempting Public Institutions from Taxation, have led public opinion on the subject, and have directly or indirectly aroused a considerable movement both for and against such exemption, including such phenomena as the recent discussion of the Free Religionists, so-called, the elaborate declaration and call of the Baptist clergymen of New Jersey, the petitions to the Massachusetts Legislature for discontinuing such exemption,' etc. This ridiculous attempt to gobble up the glory (such as it is!) of the present wide-spread agitation of the church-taxation question is simply absurd. The real cause of this agitation is to be found in the American principle of the separation of Church and State, the irresistible logic of free institutions, the growing influence upon the public mind of a National Constitution which declares that Congress shall 'make no law respecting an establishment of religion;' and this cause has operated on the public mind in many quarters, independently of any publication, to call forth a determined protest against a system of church-exemption which is practically a system of church-establishment. So far as THE INDEX is concerned, its protest against this system dates from the beginning of its career, and has no more to do with Old and New than it has with the Ashantee war. We never knew that a single word had ever been uttered in Old and New against church-exemption until its editor informed us of the fact a few weeks ago in a horse car; while the 'Demands of Liberalism' were first published in THE INDEX for April 6, 1872. The discussion on this subject at the Convention of the Free Religious Association last October, in New York city, was not in the least degree due to Old and New; and the petitions now circulating in the same general movement have not the remotest connection with it. If the editor of that periodical has the regard for truth which is attributed to him, he will at once correct the totally erroneous assertions above quoted."

Perceiving it to be quite inexpedient for its own reputation to take no notice of a criticism like the foregoing, which it knew would meet the eyes of many of its own readers, Old and New for March makes the following desperate attempt to get out of its awkward situation without withdrawing its unveracious claims:—

"We have been called to account for over-stating the influence of Mr. Quincy's widely-quoted papers in directing attention to abuses consequent upon exempting from taxation property controlled by irresponsible corporations. We make amends by bearing witness to the early and hearty support accorded to this movement by the Independent, the Baptist Christian Era, the National Baptist, the Evangelist, and other religious journals. And Mr. Quincy hastens to assure us that one of the best papers on this subject was written as long ago as 1827, by Benjamin Hazard of Rhode Island."

It is clear that Mr. Quincy is too high-minded, too much of a gentleman, to be pleased with bustling pretensions which would compromise him very unpleasantly in the eyes of the well-informed; and so he "hastens" to mention an earlier writer who had rendered valuable service to the cause of equal taxation. We have no wish whatever to dispossess Mr. Quincy of the laurels he has so justly earned by his able papers against tax-exemption, to one of which we had already appreciatingly alluded, with proper credit, in THE INDEX for January 22. We have no wish whatever to treat with disrespect the feather which Old and New sticks in its hat on Mr. Quincy's account. Still less have we any disposition to institute counter-claims on the part of this journal; we leave the small business of claim-making to those who have a taste for it. But the interests of honest and high-toned journalism require exposure of the uncandid shuffling now practised by a magazine which aspires to hold a high moral position with the American public at large. The arts of vulgar and unscrupulous competition, by which it becomes a common trick of the trade for weekly or daily newspapers to steal from each other, by neglecting to give due credit or by unblushingly filching for themselves the éclat of what they have not done, should not be allowed thus to creep up into our periodical literature without a temperate but severe rebuke from those who have the cause of a noble public morality at heart. Now for the facts.

The original statement of Old and New was that it had "led public opinion on the subject" of church-exemption, and had "directly or indirectly aroused a considerable movement both for and against such exemption;" and, quite in the spirit of the New York Herald, it proceeded to instance certain parts of this movement as illustrations of its own immense influence. These were the discussion of the church-taxation question by the Free Religious Association in New York last October (including Mr. Parton's very able and influential paper, published at the time in the New York Tribune, and since published as a tract which has been widely distributed by the Association, as well as copied extensively all over the country by the press); the action of the Baptist clergymen of New Jersey, which was opposed, however, by a considerable portion of their own number in that State as well as in this; and, lastly, the petitions recently collected and presented to the Massachusetts House of Representatives, by which, thanks to the Hon. Moses Kimball, the subject was brought up for the first time in practical business shape. The claim to have caused these movements was specific, not general; and it was this specific claim that we denied and called upon Old and New to correct. How has it responded?

It professes to "make amends" for its "over-statement," by acknowledging the "early and hearty support accorded" by several journals to "this movement," which it still leaves its readers to infer was originated by itself; while its mention of Mr. Hazard's paper does not even suggest that he had anything to do with "this movement,"—that is, with Old and New's own activity in agitating for reform. Whether the various journals thus adroitly marshalled by Old and New, as "high privates" in its own regiment, will gracefully accept its leadership, we do not know; probably the paragraph in question will never come under the notice of many of them, as probably also the original articles never did. But the point is this: Old and New claimed to have caused the New York discussion held by the Free Religious Association, and the circulation of the petitions issued by the Boston Liberal League; we denied this claim, and suggested that truth required its withdrawal; whereupon Old and New, instead of withdrawing it, pretends to "make amends" for a mere "over-statement" by alleging that various journals had rendered "early and hearty support" to its own "movement"!!! It is a disgrace to American journalism that such a spirit, unscrupulous, uncandid, and unjust, should be manifested by a magazine which is supposed to represent the best culture of Liberal Christianity,—all the more so that it lurks concealed under a seemingly off-hand style, is little likely to be detected by the casual reader, and will all the easier on this account accomplish its object. The Free Religious Association and the Boston Liberal League owe nothing to Old and New; and when the latter steps in to claim the credit of their labors, the claim is simple marauding. Probably they care very little whether the actual amount of this credit be great or small; but truth is truth, and what is of sufficient value to try to steal may be of sufficient value to keep. At any rate, there are people who would rather lose ten dollars than be robbed of one cent; and the trick of throwing the stolen goods over a fence, when chased by the police, ought not to save the marauder from the punishment of his offence.

THE DEICIDES. Analysis of the Life of Jesus, and of the Several Phases of the Christian Church in their Relation to Judaism. By J. Cohen. Translated from the French by Anna Maria Goldsmid. Baltimore: Deutsch & Co. 1873.

The aim of this work is announced to be, not to convince Christians of their error, but to free the Jews of the time of Jesus from the alleged crime of Deicide; and also to show that the charge brought against their descendants, that their dispersion, wanderings, and sufferings have been a judgment upon them for this crime of their fathers is totally unfounded. In pursuing this purpose, the author takes the Gospels as authoritative history, because out of them Christians make their charge. The question he seeks to answer is this: Is it proved from the Gospels that the Jews were guilty of Deicide? Believing, as they did, in the absolute unity and invisibility of Jehovah, it was contrary to all their most sacred ideas that He could appear in human form; and, when Jesus asserted his power to forgive sins, which they considered to belong to God only, and in other ways intimated his equality and oneness with God, they, believing him to be simply man, since he gave to them no proofs of divinity, naturally thought him guilty of blasphemy, and, by their law, worthy of death.

Then, as to the claims of Jesus to the Messiahship, the author shows that, hoping for, and expecting, the coming of a Messiah, the Jews were in readiness to accept any one who gave evidence of his commission to be such; and that at first they were disposed to listen to the teachings of Jesus, and to welcome his advent, as illustrated by his triumphant entry into Jerusalem. But proofs that he was indeed the long-looked-for Savior were wanting; and, to their reiterated demands for these, he refused to reply, or gave them only evasive answers. Besides, he did not fulfil their expectations of a coming Messiah, whose predicted reign was symbolized by the lamb's lying down with the lion, when there should be universal peace, harmony, and love. He charged secrecy upon his disciples in regard to many things that might have been regarded as evidence. In the troubled condition in which the Jews were at that time, they would have hailed with delight one who had shown himself to them as a real Deliverer.

As to the moral teachings of Jesus, the author asserts that there is not a precept, thought, or maxim of Jesus that is not to be found in the Hebrew writings, and the parallel which he draws in support of this is very striking, and may not be a little surprising to those accustomed to believe that all the morality of the Gospels originated with Jesus. As only one example, take the Golden Rule, which has been claimed as an original enunciation of Jesus, and compare it with the Mosaic law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," and the precept of Hillel, a doctor of the Temple, "Do not unto others that which thou wouldst not that they should do unto thee." And it should be observed that Jesus himself adds, after giving the Rule, as also in other similar instances, "for this is the law and the prophets." The analogy shown between the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount and those found here and there in the Hebrew Scriptures is well worth considering. The comparison between the morality of the Gospel and that found in the Old Testament, contained in Books Tenth and Eleventh, is commended to the attention of those who would do justice equally to the teachings of the Jewish writers and to the claims of originality in the teachings of Jesus. If it is said that these moral teachings of the Old Testament are offset by others of a contrary order, the same may be affirmed, in a degree, of those of the New. The author claims that the history of Christianity since the time of Jesus has failed to prove to the Jews his right to the title of Messiah. The doings of the apostles after the death of Jesus, their divisions among themselves, Paul's deviations from Judaism, and the corruptions of Christianity by Paganism,—all tend to sustain them in the conviction that their rejection of Jesus as the Christ was just.

The Deicides, as a whole, is commended to the attention of those who would form an unprejudiced and a just estimate of that much-wronged and persecuted race which has been accused of this crime. The work is highly interesting as coming from a Jewish point of view, and, in the main, it is characterized by great candor and fairness. The author, while asserting what he considers the truths of Judaism, treats Christianity with respect. At the same time, the conceit that the Jews are God's "chosen people," and that all nations will at length be converted to their faith, cannot fail to be noticed. And it is to be regretted that with so many noble ideas as are expressed, the writer, in common with his people, cannot rise to the conception of a Universal Religion, limited to no one existing form, but embracing, in its wide extent, the true and good of each, and based upon the radical elements of human relations to the Perfect—the Divine. IRREDEEMABLE BALLOTS.

Feb. 9, 1874.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—In one of your "Glimpses" recently, you make the inquiry, "Why should not women have the right to vote when they are required to pay taxes?" The proper way for Radicals to discuss any subject is to go to the beginning of it; and I should like to ask, first, What is government? and what is the ballot? Is not government organized force? and is not the ballot the representation of that force?

Women are not taxed; it is property that is taxed, without regard to ownership or representation, excepting of course church property.

Taxation does not give or imply representation in any case. Property is taxed without being represented. We tax foreigners for many millions without giving them a vote; and a man may be taxed for property in a dozen different towns and not be represented in one of them. Taxes and suffrage have nothing at all to do with each other. The man who never was taxed for five dollars has as large a vote as the man who is taxed yearly for millions.

But taxation and protection do go together. We tax what we protect, and we are bound to protect all that we tax. If it vexes Miss Abby Smith that Patrick should vote away her property in town meeting, let her remember that she is never called on to protect that property; while in case of need Patrick is bound, and may be called on, even at the risk or sacrifice of his own life, to defend the property in which he has no personal interest.

Women cannot vote effectively for the same reason that we cannot pay our National debt in green-backs; because there is no intrinsic value in a piece of paper. The green-back is of value, only so far as it represents and is redeemable in gold. The ballot is effective only as it represents and is redeemable, if necessary, in force.

There must be gold at the botton of the currency; there must be force at the basis of government. The male vote represents all the force there is in the State; and on the quantity, quality, and organization of that force depends the strength, the freedom, and the very existence of the State and all that we call government, law and order, protection and justice. The whole vote of the women would add nothing to that force, and for State purposes would be utterly worthless.

Woman may be a ruler, and a good one; a general, but not the army; an officer, perhaps, but not a soldier. She may be elected and hold office, but the election lies with the men. A green-back is receivable for everything but "duties on imports and interest on the public debt." So a woman's ballot may be made good for town meetings, or for any local occasion where she has the power of the State to back her; but "man constitutes the State."

An irredeemable currency and an irredeemable ballot argue themselves out to the same conclusion.

[1. If government is not organized justice and reason as well as organized force, it is nothing but tyranny. "Organized force" is the description of a military despotism; but not of a free republic. The State has no right to exist at all, if its roots are not found in the moral and intellectual nature of man, rather than in his fists. The ballot represents this moral and intellectual nature, or else feeble-bodied and invalid men should be disfranchised as universally as women. Some of the best voters we know could scarcely hold a musket.

2. It is true that taxation is based on protection, not on representation. But protection of what? Of property alone? "Of life, liberty, and property," says our State Constitution. Very good: property may be protected to some extent by fists, but neither life, liberty, nor property can be fully protected without brains and hearts. Taxation does imply Protection; but Protection implies Representation. No man's liberty is safe whom the State counts as a political cipher; neither is any woman's. Unrepresented, any class of the people are slaves of a will they cannot oppose; and the liberty of the African was found to involve his suffrage. So will it be with woman.

3. It is also true that the irredeemable ballot is worthless. But the gold that must redeem it is the gold of ideas, not of muscles. Education alone can make ballots of any worth; and the necessity of making them redeemable in ideas is the overwhelming argument for universal education. With this argument sex has nothing to do. The ballot that is redeemable only in fists is redeemable in copper, not in gold. —ED.]

THE TRUE TITLE TO PROPERTY.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Your reply to Mr. Heberling in a late INDEX seems to me to contain a trifling fallacy, which I have the presumption to attempt to expose.

1. I never heard that "cost, the limit of price," was in any sense a definition of property, or that any one ever thought it might be.

The title of this thrifty husbandman, John Smith, to the possession of the whole one hundred bushels which his field has produced is in nowise affected, either way, by the "cost principle;" inasmuch as that principle is only applicable to the exchange of commodities.

Suppose that John, instead of planting corn, had been on the sea-shore, and, having an eye for the beautiful, had stooped to pick up a shell which caught his fancy; I suppose that, without doing violence to the "cost principle," one may affirm that the shell then belonged to him, not to all mankind, and that not all mankind would have the shadow of a right to attempt to dispossess him of it. The "cost principle" does not debar him from holding as his own what never cost the individual one particle of labor.

But if John should attempt to sell or barter the shell,—being thoroughly imbued with the "cost principle,"—he would charge only for his labor in stooping for it, or in preserving it afterward. There is confessedly no exchange of commodities with Nature, and the "cost principle" cannot be made a test of what we are entitled to receive from her hand. Any argument, therefore, "reductio ad absurdum," based upon a contrary supposition, is quite thrown away.

2. Perhaps something might be said, also, by way of reply to the other point, that "the only way to vindicate his right to the whole crop is to concede the rightfulness of taking interest on capital invested." I quote further: "A quantity of corn equal to what he planted, plus a quantity of corn exactly equal to the value of his time and labor, is all that the 'cost principle' will allow to be justly his; and the rest is the common wealth of mankind, free to all." Would it be impertinent to ask you to go a step beyond this, and say what quantity of corn will balance his time and labor,—and about what residue would be left over to mankind?

3. You call the ninety-five bushels "monstrous wages." Why so? Their value to their possessor is simply their purchasing power; and if they are used to purchase from others only the product of an amount of labor equal to that expended in their production, is John at all overpaid? What other test have we for deciding what he may claim from Nature, as a fair remuneration, save that supplied by the market value of the thing claimed?

If five bushels, out of the ninety-five, will command in the market an equivalent for the amount of labor expended in producing the whole (as it might on any other than the "cost principle"), then the remainder should belong to all mankind. But on the "cost principle" the whole production stands for John's wages, "exactly equal to the value of his time and labor," and empowered to purchase just so much of the time and labor of others. I see nothing remaining to be accounted for as "interest on capital invested,"—nor do I think Mr. Heberling need flinch, so far, from the logical consequences of his principle.

What more need be said in support of a farmer's right to his whole crop, as against the rest of his fellows, than that it is the fruit of his labor rather than theirs? Yours, A QUESTIONER.

[1. The "cost principle" maintains that a man should exchange only equivalents for equivalents; and that he may justly charge for the products of his labor such a price only as is the exact equivalent of his labor. That is, the labor-cost is justly the price-limit in exchange.

Now this principle rests on another principle back of itself, which it logically implies and assumes: namely, that a man has a valid property-right to the products of his own labor, and has no property-right to anything else. For instance, A picks up a diamond; B picks up a brickbat. The labor-cost being the same, A should exchange his diamond for B's brickbat on equal terms; he has no property-right to any value which the diamond may have over and above the cost of picking it up. If he had any property-right to the intrinsic value of the diamond, he could justly exchange the diamond for a higher price than its labor-cost; which would be to surrender the "cost principle."

Hence it is very clear that the "cost principle" rests on a particular theory of the true title to property, and cannot stop short with the mere "exchange of commodities." It reduces all property-rights to the right of labor to its own products. John's shell, in the illustration offered by "Questioner," is not his except to the extent of the labor involved in picking it up; he has confessedly no right to charge more for it than an exact equivalent of this labor. The "cost principle," therefore, affirms one species of property-right, and denies all others. "Questioner" must question a little more profoundly. Mr. Heberling did suppose "an exchange of commodities with Nature," by calling the harvest the "wages" paid by her in return for the direction of her energies by the husbandman; and therefore the application of the "cost principle" to the exchange was quite in order.

2. We cannot undertake to furnish the "cost principle" with what it utterly lacks, so far as we have heard it expounded by its advocates; namely, a criterion of the real cost of labor. They allow every one to fix this cost as he thinks best; and we have tried in vain to get some explicit statement of a principle to be applied universally in fixing it.

3. The "market value" of anything is the price determined by the law of supply and demand. It is confessedly impossible to vindicate the husbandman's right to his whole crop on the "cost principle," if this price is allowed. But it is equally impossible, if the right of labor to its own products is the only valid property-right; for the crop is the joint product of the laborer's energy, and Nature's, too. What she is entitled to as her share is not the laborer's,—at least on the "cost principle." To vindicate his right to the entire crop, the "cost principle" has to be abandoned; which was the point of our former notes.—ED.]

PREAMBLE AND CONSTITUTION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF PROVIDENCE, R.I.

PREAMBLE.

Believing that a reasonable and natural religion finds its best and truest expression in the physical, intellectual, and spiritual development of mankind, we organize in accordance with the following

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I. Name.—This society shall be called the Free Religious Society of Providence.

ART. II. Object.—Its object is to promote the practice of virtue, the study of truth, and the fraternity of man.

ART. III. Membership.—Applications for membership shall be reported to the society by the Executive Committee, and may be acted upon at any regularly appointed meeting.

ART. IV. Opinions.—Membership in this society shall leave each individual responsible for his opinions to himself alone, and affect in no respect his relations to other societies; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the society shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief, or as defining the position of the society, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief, or as interfering in any other way with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being.

ART. V. Officers.—The officers of this society shall be a President, one or more Vice-Presidents, a Treasurer, a Secretary, and an Executive Committee.

ART. VI. Meetings.—There shall be an annual meeting of the society for the election of officers, on the first Tuesday evening in October, and quarterly meetings shall be held for the transaction of general business.

ART. VII. Amendments.—Amendments to the Constitution shall not be made except at an annual or quarterly meeting.

A PARABLE OF JUSTICE.

Already doth the Spirit of Justice sit upon the throne of her glory; and before her pass all nations. And she separateth them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats. She setteth the sheep on her right hand, but the goats on the left.

Then she saith to those on her right hand: "Rejoice, ye blessed of my Father, in the happiness which belongs to you. For I was hungry, and ye gave me food. I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink. I was a stranger, and ye took me in. I was sick, and ye visited me; in prison, and ye came unto me."

But the righteous answer her: "Mighty Spirit, when saw we thee hungry and thirsty, and gave thee food or drink? when saw we thee a stranger and sheltered thee? or when saw we thee sick or in prison, and came unto thee?"

Then doth Justice say unto them: "In buying and selling honestly ye have given me food and drink. Your fidelity to your promises has been my shelter, and your respect for your neighbors' reputation healed me of all sickness. Your payment of outlawed debts, and of taxes on all your possessions, has set me free from prison, and clothed me in royal robes. Thus ye have done unto me, and I render unto you likewise."

Then doth she say also to those on the left hand: "Ye must depart hence from before my face, and shame and sorrow go with you. For I was hungry, and ye gave me no food; thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; a stranger, and ye took me not in; sick and in prison, and ye did not visit me."

And they also answer: "Mighty Spirit, when saw we thee hungry, or thirsty, or shelterless, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee?"

And she answers them, saying: "Your sharp bargains would have famished me, and your broken promises made me shelterless. Your slanders have been to me as a disease, and your repudiated debts and evaded taxes a prison. Behold, I render unto you as ye have done to me."

These go their ways, bearing with them their enduring punishment. But the righteous rejoice already in life eternal. F. M. H.

MAMMA: "Well, Johnny, I shall forgive you this time, and it's very pretty of you to write a letter to say you're sorry." Johnny: "Yes, ma; don't tear it up, please." Mamma: "Why Johnny?" Johnny: "Because it will do for next time."—Judy.

A WIDE-AWAKE "Cape Codist" handed a letter to the postmaster to ascertain the weight of it. Being told that it was a trifle over half an ounce, he was observed to take out his penknife and whittle the corners to its just weight, thereby saving three cents.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 1 Tremont Place, Boston.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to

Form a Liberal League,

we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

BUST OF THEODORE PARKER,

BY

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

$5 TO $20 PER DAY easily made by any one. We want men, women, boys, and girls all over the country to sell our fine Steel Engravings, Chromos, Crayon Drawings, Illuminations, Photographs, etc., etc. We now publish the finest assortment ever placed before the public, and our prices are marked down so low as to defy all competition. No one subscribes for a premium-giving paper in order to get a picture, after seeing our pictures and learning our prices. We have many old agents at work for us, who have made canvassing for books, papers, etc., their business for years, and they all report that they can make much more money at work for us than at anything else. Our prices are so low that all can afford to purchase, and therefore the pictures sell at sight at almost every house. New beginners do as well as agents who have had large experience, for our beautiful subjects and low prices are appreciated by all. To make large sales everywhere all an agent has to do is to show the pictures from house to house. Don't look for work elsewhere until you have seen what great inducements we offer you to make money. We have not space to explain all here, but send us your address and we will send full particulars, free, by mail. Don't delay if you want profitable work for your leisure hours, or for your whole time. Now is the favorable time to engage in this business. Our pictures are the finest and most pleasing in this country, and are endorsed by all the leading papers, including the New York Herald. Those who cannot give the business their entire attention can work up their own localities, and make a handsome sum without ever being away from home over night. Let all who want pleasant, profitable employment, without risking capital, send us their addresses at once, and learn all about the business for themselves. Address

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——;

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

BOSTON, Sept. 1, 1873.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

THE NEW English Parliament will have two genuine working-men in it—Mr. Burt from Morpeth, and Mr. Macdonald from Stafford.

THE AUTHOR OF Ginx's Baby, Mr. Edward Jenkins (lately in this country), has been elected to Parliament as a liberal member from Dundee.

WHERE should the seat of government be?—at Washington, or Boston, or some other external locality; or in the private breast of each individual?

THE CHINESE are said to have an Encyclopædia which consists of one hundred and sixty thousand volumes. The Appletons' Annual Encyclopædia promises to overtake it in due time.

A CORRESPONDENT to The Nation speaks of Wendell Phillips as "faltering in his years, and paltering with his principles." It naturally may be that Mr. Phillips is "faltering in his years," and it would be gracious not to twit him with it; but that it is true that he is "paltering with his principles," we can only say that we hope not, and we think not.

THE Woman's Journal says: "No matter how faithful to God, no woman is the equal of her brother among the Musselmans. This is the essential superiority of Christianity—that it teaches the equality of men and women before God." Perhaps the writer of the foregoing never has read the Epistles of Paul, who was a man of some note among the founders of Christianity.

MR. GLADSTONE came into power in 1868. He will now, says the Examiner, "cross over to the opposition bench with the reflection—let us hope the humiliating reflection—that he has smashed the Liberal party." The Examiner thinks that Mr. Gladstone's disasters "began with the commencement of his compromises, and have set in steadily from the time of his suicidal weakness in the matter of the Educational Act."

MR. BRADLAUGH arrived in London Sunday morning, Feb. 8, too late to take any personal part in the Parliamentary canvass. But, on Tuesday, he went to Northampton, where he received a perfect ovation from his friends, to whom he made two stirring speeches. He promised to renew the campaign for Parliament on the first opportunity, and, if he lives, he will probably yet sit as a member in the House of Commons.

REV. MR. MURRAY, of the Park Street Church in this city, told his congregation last Sunday morning that he needs a long vacation, and that he proposes to take one,—from April 1 to October 1. He also asked for a colleague. If Mr. Murray is sick, we are sorry; and we hope he may soon get well. And, as his health improves, we hope his theology will make equal progress towards logical soundness; for, although he is now quite liberal in some respects, his liberalism is of that inconsistent sort which is hard to fix or describe.

REV. DR. BARTOL has just completed his thirty-seventh year of service as pastor of the West Church in this city. We are glad to say that Dr. Bartol is still hale and hearty, though what is called old age is creeping over him. Yet in old age he is youthful, because his spirit is fresh and his mind progressive. Unlike many old men, he has not stood still or gone backward in his thought, but has kept pace with the onward march of ideas. Long may he live to be both by his word and his life an inspiration and blessing to many!

WE ARE GLAD that the women of Massachusetts do not propose, in their movement in behalf of temperance, to follow the sensational tactics of the Dio Lewis campaign in Ohio. We believe that women can do a great work for any cause in which they may enlist, and especially so, if they adhere to those methods in the use of which they particularly excel; namely, the persuasive. If any distinctive movement by women, in the direction of temperance reform, is to be made in Massachusetts, we trust it will be of a deep, quiet, sensible, and intelligent nature.

THE National Reformer (Charles Bradlaugh's organ), of Feb. 15, contains a card from Mr. Bradlaugh on resuming his editorial functions on that paper. In the course of his brief "Personal," he says: "My next duty is to record my most sincere acknowledgments to the great bulk of the American press, and my hearty gratitude to the American people, for the generous and hospitable treatment I have received during my stay in the United States." We believe that the amicable feeling expressed by Mr. Bradlaugh towards his American friends is most cordially reciprocated by them; and we heartily congratulate him on the high reputation which he has achieved in this country, and his safe return to England.

DOES THE Golden Age know of any paper published in London called The Index? We suppose so, from the fact that it quotes from what it is pleased to designate "an article from the London Index, written by the eminent English clergyman, the Rev. Charles Voysey, [which] favors the burning of the body, and makes suggestions for the deposit of the ashes in appropriate urns." But it happens that this same "article" was written for THE INDEX, by Mr. Voysey himself, and was published in THE INDEX of April 12, 1873, as our regular "London Letter" from Mr. Voysey. We presume that the Golden Age desires to be accurate in its quotations, and to give credit where credit is due. We would respectfully suggest, therefore, that it "overhaul its log-book" to find its error in this matter, and, "when found," that it "make a note on't."

WE HAVE a chaplain in the United States Senate, who uses very pointed language in prayer. He is too polite, however, to be personal in his remarks. This is the way he "spoke about it" one day last week. His "topic" was lying and slander. He deplored "the spirit of lying which is abroad," and "the giant demon of slander that stalks forth, casting upon all the earth a fearful shadow." He besought God to "paralyze the hand that writes the wilful detraction," and to "palsy the tongue that utters wanton calumny." Very vigorous, Mr. Chaplain; but why didn't you name your men? It isn't safe to have divine judgments flung around loose among folks, lest the innocent should get more hits than the guilty. Hand in your specifications, reverend sir, before you ask the Deity to let fly his thunderbolts of wrath even in so promiscuously wicked a place as Washington!

IN A LETTER from Boston to the New York Evening Post, Rev. Dr. Samuel Osgood says:—

"Mr. Emerson spoke at the meeting of the Overseers of Harvard University, upon the compulsory attendance of the students at the chapel prayers, and he surprised his hearers by his defence of the usage, and upon grounds quite consistent with his philosophy. He said that prayer is the highest act of the human mind, and he did not think it right to take away from young men the benefit of that act."

Mr. Emerson has always been averse to speaking in the presence of a reporter, because, he says, no reporter ever reports him correctly. We cannot but think that, in the instance to which Dr. Osgood alludes, he was both misunderstood and misreported. If Ralph Waldo Emerson approves of the practice of compelling college students to attend college prayers, we confess that we have misunderstood him.

Darwin's Theory of Conscience:

ITS RELATION TO

SCIENTIFIC ETHICS.

EIGHTH LECTURE IN THE COURSE OF SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES, DELIVERED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, BOSTON, FEB. 22, 1874.

BY FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

It is the object of this lecture to state the leading features of Mr. Darwin's theory of conscience, as contained in the second volume of his Descent of Man; then to sketch in outline the fundamental principles of Ethics, regarded as a Natural Science independent of all supernatural revelation, whether real or supposed; and finally to show the relation which the great doctrine of Evolution, and more particularly Mr. Darwin's application of it, bears to Ethics so considered and treated. In carrying out this purpose, I must at the outset beg your indulgence, if the nature of our subject obliges us to travel through unbeaten paths, and to encounter the rocks and thickets which such paths will naturally oppose to our progress. I trust that your patience and good-nature will not be exhausted, although we shall find ourselves involved in discussions of an abstract and possibly arid character, from which the necessity of brevity will exclude the frequent illustrations and digressions so agreeable to the tired mind in the arduous pursuit of truth. If I have erred in regarding the audience of this "Course of Sunday Afternoon Lectures" as the most intellectual one which it has ever been my privilege to address, you will pardon me for bringing before you a paper which perhaps ought to be read rather than listened to; for the mistake will have been due to the high conception I entertain of your requirements, and to my conviction that this Course is sustained and attended for the sole purpose of affording an opportunity to your lecturers of communicating the results of researches which concern the profoundest subjects of human thought, and which find elsewhere no fitting place of announcement. I will make no apology, therefore, for omitting everything of a merely popular character from this lecture, and for treating its subject in the most clear, condensed, and consecutive manner which my necessarily hurried preparations have permitted.

Sir William Hamilton quotes from Immanuel Kant, as the best example he can find of the sublime, in all three of its highest forms, the well-known passage commencing with the following words: "Two things there are which, the oftener and the more steadfastly we consider, fill the mind with an ever new, an ever rising admiration and reverence; the STARRY HEAVENS above, the MORAL LAW within." Mr. Darwin quotes from the same great thinker another passage which is certainly no less exalted: "Duty! Wondrous thought, that workest neither by fond insinuation, flattery, nor by any thre t, but merely by holding up thy naked law in the soul, and so extorting for thyself always reverence, if not always obedience; before whom all appetites are dumb, however secretly they rebel; whence thy original?"

This great question—"What is the origin of the moral sense of man?"—is the question propounded by Mr. Darwin; and after saying that it "has been discussed by many writers of consummate ability," he adds, with a modesty which wins from all his candid readers an admiration ready to melt into a warmer sentiment still: "My sole excuse for touching on it is the impossibility of here passing it over, and because, so far as I know, no one has approached it exclusively from the side of natural history." [Descent of Man, II., 68.] In this unpretending manner Mr. Darwin introduces an examination of the origin of the moral sense in man which, simply because it is the first attempt to approach the problem purely from the side of natural history or science, I must rank among the most profoundly important contributions ever made to what has been hitherto vainly styled the "Science of Ethics." Incomplete as I think it is, it nevertheless marks the era when first the scientific method extended its domain so far as to include the realm of morals within its lawful jurisdiction. In this lies the greatest and the permanent significance of Mr. Darwin's theory of conscience. I cannot say that I view his theory as coëxtensive with the facts; I must admit that he passes by some facts which "natural history," indeed, is not called upon to consider, yet which science in a larger sense will find essential to a complete theory of morals. But what he states affirmatively is true, in the main, and of the highest value; it will hereafter never be omitted in any philosophy of human nature which aspires to treat its subject in a comprehensive and scientific manner; and it gives suggestion and specific direction to a host of inquiries and investigations which his general theory alone was sure sooner or later to elicit. When the twentieth century comes to count over the jewels bequeathed to it by its predecessor, the great impulse given to thought by the patience, knowledge, and genius of Charles Darwin will be among the brightest and most glorious; while the magnificent magnanimity with which he has always gone out of his way to acknowledge any small indebtedness to others, and to praise even his open antagonists for whatever truth they may have brought to light, has made it henceforth impossible for scientific controversy to decline again to the miserable jealousies of the past, without incurring the swift and indignant rebuke of a world which has now seen what nobility and dignity can be imparted to the warfare of ideas by the self-forgetting love of truth.

DARWIN'S STATEMENT OF THE THEORY.

To proceed to the immediate task in hand, permit me now to summarize the theory of conscience which Mr. Darwin has advanced. It will be best to do this in his own words:—

"The following proposition seems to me in a high degree probable—namely, that any animal whatever, endowed with well-marked social instincts, would inevitably acquire a moral sense or conscience, as soon as its intellectual powers had become as well developed, or nearly as well developed, as in man. For, firstly, the social instincts lead an animal to take pleasure in the society of its fellows, to feel a certain amount of sympathy with them, and to perform various services for them. The services may be of a definite and evidently instinctive nature; or there may be only a wish and readiness, as with most of the higher social animals, to aid their fellows in certain general ways. But these feelings and services are by no means extended to all the individuals of the same species,—only to those of the same association. Secondly, as soon as the mental faculties had become highly developed, images of all past actions and motives would be incessantly passing through the brain of each individual; and that feeling of dissatisfaction which invariably results, as we shall hereafter see, from any unsatisfied instinct, would arise, as often as it was perceived that the enduring and always present social instinct had yielded to some other instinct, at the time stronger, but neither enduring in its nature nor leaving behind it a very vivid impression. It is clear that many instinctive desires, such as that of hunger, are in their nature of short duration; and, after being satisfied, are not readily or vividly recalled. Thirdly, after the power of language had been acquired and the wishes of the members of the same community could be distinctly expressed, the common opinion how each member ought to act for the public good would naturally become to a large extent the guide to action. But the social instincts would still give the impulse to act for the good of the community, this impulse being strengthened, directed, and sometimes even deflected, by public opinion, the power of which rests, as we shall presently see, on instinctive sympathy. Lastly, habit in the individual would ultimately play a very important part in guiding the conduct of each member; for the social instincts and impulses, like all other instincts, would be greatly strengthened by habit, as would obedience to the wishes and judgment of the community." [pp. 68–70.]

ANOTHER STATEMENT.

From the above and succeeding statements of Mr. Darwin, I gather the following as a digest of the leading principles of the theory under consideration:—

1. "A moral being," he says by way of definition, "is one who is capable of comparing his past and future actions or motives, and of approving or disapproving of them. We have no reason to suppose that any of the lower animals have this capacity; therefore when a monkey faces danger to rescue its comrade, or takes charge of an orphan-monkey, we do not call his conduct moral. But in the case of man, who alone can with certainty be ranked as a moral being, actions of a certain class are called moral, whether performed deliberately after a struggle with opposing motives, or from the effects of slowly gained habit, or impulsively through instinct." [p. 85.]

2. Any animal becomes moral as soon as it acquires sufficient mental power to compare its various motives and actions in the past, the present, and the future, so as to pronounce some of them right and others wrong. The acquisition of a moral sense, therefore, depends on the prior acquisition of a certain degree of intellectual power; this Mr. Darwin, as above quoted, explicitly states. [p. 69.]

3. The difference between man and the higher animals is one of degree rather than of kind; but in a broad way man is now to be classed as moral, while they are non-moral. [pp. 67, 85, 101.]

4. "The moral sense is fundamentally identical with the social instincts." [pp. 93, 94.] In them is its origin; and its later development is only their higher manifestation, as modified and directed by increased mental power. Man's moral sense results from his nature and experience as a social being.

5. The social instincts were in the first instance called into existence through the law of Natural Selection: "Such social qualities [as sympathy, fidelity, and courage], the paramount importance of which is disputed by no one, were no doubt acquired by the progenitors of man in a similar manner, namely, through natural selection, aided by inherited habit." [p. 156.] "This instinct [of sympathy] no doubt was originally acquired, like all the other social instincts, through natural selection." [p. 158.]

6. The social instincts are "innate in the lower animals;" and there is no reason to suppose that the case is otherwise with man. It is unlikely that the moral sense is acquired freshly and independently of ancestral inheritance by each individual. [p. 68, note.]

7. The social instincts are permanent and ever-present, but not so powerful as the transient impulses of hunger, thirst, self-preservation, lust, vengeance, and so forth. If the power of reflecting upon past actions, and of comparing their motives with present motives, is not yet developed, no moral consciousness can appear; but where this power is developed, the sacrifice of the enduring instincts to the transient ones becomes, when the vivid impression of the latter has faded away, the cause of regret and remorse. The moral sense is thus reduced to a conflict of instincts, the victory of the strong transient instincts over the feebler permanent instincts, and the dissatisfaction that ensues when in recollection the victorious transient instincts, now dormant, seem to have been feebler than the conquered social instincts which are still active in the mind. This remembered dissatisfaction enters into the next conflict, however, as a new motive reinforcing the feeble social instincts; and if the two combined vanquish the urgent transient impulses, then a high degree of satisfaction ensues on afterwards recalling the struggle in memory. This is moral self-approval.

8. After repeated conflicts of this sort, the force of habit comes in to augment the ease with which the victorious instincts, whether the permanent or the transient ones, overcome their antagonists. If the victory is repeatedly won by either class of instincts, the force of habit increases its strength in every succeeding conflict; and thus the moral sense, that is, the tendency of the social to conquer the anti-social instincts, acquires by degrees an increased or diminished power.

9. When habit has thus strengthened the moral sense in any individual until the victory of the moral sense becomes almost certain, the tendency thus acquired becomes transmissible to offspring, reappearing in them as a stronger natural moral endowment, or innate tendency to virtue. In this manner inherited virtues or inherited vices become comprehensible.

10. The fact of language, bringing to bear upon each individual the new motives of hoped-for praise or dreaded blame,—that is, of public opinion,—also exercises a powerful influence in developing further the moral sense which has had its origin in the social instincts of the individual.

11. The moral sense thus developed out of the social instincts will vary according to the social requirements of different animals, or different communities of the same animal. The social instincts will simply prompt to such actions as are for the good of the community concerned. Different social circumstances, requiring different lives of action, will thus tend to evolve different types of conscience; and actions which are social or good in one community will be anti-social or bad in another. Mr. Darwin puts the extreme case of supposing men reared precisely under the same condition as bees; in which case the unmarried female would, like the worker-bees, kill their brothers, and mothers would strive to kill their fertile daughters. Whatever, in short, should promote the good of the community would be right; and whatever should have a contrary effect would be wrong. [p. 70.] Mr. Darwin, therefore, takes, "as the test of morality, the general good or welfare of the community." [p. 94.] In the case of the bees, this would require the murder of drones by the workers, and of young queen-bees by their mothers; and this, Mr. Darwin thinks, would be approved by the moral sense of the bee-community, if they came to have any.

12. Lastly, we arrive at the following statements as the nearest approach made by Mr. Darwin to a precise definition of "conscience": "At the moment of action, man will no doubt be apt to follow the stronger impulse; and, though this may occasionally prompt him to the noblest deeds, it will far more commonly lead him to gratify his own desires at the expense of other men. But, after their gratification, when past and weaker impressions are contrasted with the ever-enduring social instincts, retribution will surely come. Man will then feel dissatisfied with himself, and will resolve, with more or less force, to act differently for the future. This is conscience; for conscience looks backward and judges past actions, inducing that kind of dissatisfaction which, if weak, we call regret, and, if severe, remorse." [p. 87.] "Thus at last man comes to feel, through acquired and perhaps inherited habit, that it is best for him to obey his more persistent instincts. The imperious word ought seems merely to imply the consciousness of the existence of a persistent instinct, either innate or partly acquired, serving him as a guide, though liable to be disobeyed. We hardly use the word ought in a metaphorical sense when we say hounds ought to hunt, pointers to point, and retrievers to retrieve their game. If they fail thus to act, they fail in their duty and act wrongly." [p. 88.] But this seems to be the clearest and compactest definition given by Mr. Darwin: "Ultimately, a highly complex sentiment having its first origin in the social instincts, largely guided by the approbation of our fellow-men, ruled by reason, self-interest, and in later times by deep religious feelings, confirmed by instruction and habit, all combined, constitute our moral sense or conscience." [p. 159.]

TWO LEADING CRITICISMS.

Now do we not all perceive and feel that there is a vast amount of truth in this ethical theory of England's greatest living thinker? Yet do we not also all perceive and feel that it fails to gather up and unite all the truths that belong to his subject? Two thoughts may have forced themselves upon your minds, as they have upon mine:—

First, that this theory, reducing the moral sense in the last analysis to an individual's instinct,—and placing the supreme test of morality in the welfare of a community, although it is conceded that the welfare of different communities may require in a given case diametrically opposite courses of conduct.—fails to furnish any ideas or principles of right which are universal and absolute in their application, equally valid for all times and climes; and,

Secondly, that this exclusively subjective validity of the moral sense, and the total absence of universal principles or ideas of right, disqualify the theory for serving as the sufficient ground of a natural science of morals, which, like all other sciences, must be both objective and universal.

Various other criticisms or interrogations naturally occur at different points of the theory; yet to my mind they are subordinate to the two I have mentioned. Important, however, as they are, they are consistent with a full recognition of the substantial truth of the theory, so far as it goes; and it would be approximately correct to say that it is true in what it affirms, and false only in what it omits to affirm. To be sure, the omitted truths would require modification in some of its positions; but the theory of Mr. Darwin (who has by no means made it his object to set forth a complete science of morals, but only to trace the development of the moral sense) has nevertheless its true place as part of such a science. The work he has done is invaluable, and could certainly have been done by no hand less masterly than his; and the two criticisms I have made do not in the least degree detract from its value, but simply point out the absolute necessity of doing other work also, before it will be otherwise than an abuse of words to speak of a "science of morals." There is a superabundance of ethical systems in the world; but, so far as I know, no attempt has yet been made to study and group ethical facts by the same scientific method which obtains with reference to all sciences not "falsely so called." President Porter, of Yale College, has just reviewed a new treatise in two volumes, by H. J. A. Körner, entitled Natur-Ethik, which may possibly be an attempt in this direction; but I cannot speak from knowledge of it. So long as there is only here and there a solitary thinker who does not deride the idea of applying the strictly scientific method to morals, religion, and philosophy, it would be irrational to expect attempts of this nature. But for now many years I have ceased to expect light from any other quarter; and I must ask pardon for the presumption of now trying to sketch in outline, under three chief divisions, what I have ventured to call—

SCIENTIFIC ETHICS.

I. MORAL OBLIGATION AN OBJECTIVE REALITY; SCIENTIFIC ETHICS AS GROUNDED ON THE NATURE OF THINGS.

1. Science Concerned with the Objective and Universal.

All science must rest on that which is objective and universal. There is no possibility of resting it on that which is subjective: for science deals primarily with general relations, which can be expressed in general terms. The word species denotes simply a relation of resemblance among many individual objects; the word genus denotes simply a relation of resemblance among many species. Classification and generalization belong to the very essence of science; and they conduct immediately beyond the region of subjectivity, which is peculiar to the individual. The subjective is individual; the objective is universal. Science, therefore, is concerned only with the objective and the universal.

2. Ethics the Science of Socio-Moral Relations.

Ethics is concerned only with the various relations subsisting among moral beings, as such. It deals with the facts of conscience,—that is, con-science, or what all moral beings know, or should know, regarding their mutual relations; and therefore it might be properly defined as "The Science of Rights and Duties among All Moral Beings, considered as Members of a Universal Society." Rights and duties signify the same essential fact, viewed differently: a common right is a duty which all individuals owe to each other; a common duty is a right which all individuals may claim from each other. For instance, the enjoyment of freedom is a right of the individual as against all other individuals, while it is a duty of all individuals as towards each other; in other words, the enjoyment of freedom is a right which belongs to every individual, and it is a duty incumbent on all other individuals to respect it. All right and all duties,—all the facts of conscience with which Ethics deal,—are social in their nature; they imply society,—they depend on society,—they would vanish without society. If society could be abolished,—if the moral nature which directly or indirectly has grown out of man's social relations could be expunged from his constitution,—all his rights and duties would be abolished also, and morality would vanish from his character. It may be difficult to believe this; yet analysis will show it to be true. "Benevolence, justice, truthfulness, purity, order," to which Archbishop Whately reduces all other virtues, are strictly social in their nature; they concern others as well as ourselves. Suppose (or try to suppose) an absolutely isolated and unrelated moral being, alone in the universe, devoid of all that grows directly or indirectly out of social relations, education, and conditions. He could not be truthful or untruthful, kind or unkind, just or unjust, chaste or unchaste, orderly or disorderly; for all morality implies moral actions, and there would be no possibility of exercising either the virtues or the vices. We cannot, it is true, conceive such a being; we cannot divest him of the attributes which result from social conditions; we cannot imagine what could remain to him after all social relations and their subtile influences had been absolutely cancelled. Even the so-called "self-regarding virtues" could not belong to him. An absolutely unrelated being would be sexless, sex implying a relation of duality; chastity, therefore, could not exist. Temperance would be no virtue; for intemperance is a vice because of the evils it inflicts on others, the social degradation it causes to oneself, the incapacity for social duties it entails, and the intrinsic loss of self-respect which ensues on unfitting oneself for these innumerable duties. Even self-respect means respect for self as faithful to all rights and duties as a member of society; if it is supposed to mean the relation one bears to himself, this very supposition is to create an artificial social relation with himself; and when all social rights and duties vanished, there would be nothing left for self-respect to rest on. Lastly, no duties to God can be conceived to remain; for duties to God imply a social relation between him and us, since he, as a moral being, is a member of the great society of all moral beings, and all social relations by the supposition are imagined to be abolished. Besides, we owe no duties to God which are independent of our duties to each other; love, reverence, gratitude, and so forth, are improperly considered duties. Thus it appears that so-called duties to self and to God are ultimately reducible to social duties; that Ethics deal with social rights and duties alone; and that, social rights and duties being objective and universal relations among all moral beings, Ethics deal with the objective and universal, which is the subject-matter of all science. It follows that Ethics are one of the sciences, as truly as astronomy or geology.

3. Moral Obligation an Objective and Universal Fact.

I have shown that Ethics treat of rights and duties among all moral beings, as objective and universal facts. This is only to state in other words that Moral Obligation is itself an objective and universal fact; for rights and duties are merely moral obligations resulting from the coëxistence of moral beings in social relations. These obligations are not accidental or fortuitous; they are not one thing here and another thing there; they exist all the same, whether understood or misunderstood; they are not the result of any artificial compact, and can neither be created nor destroyed by any artificial means. For instance, the moral obligation of all men to be just to each other does not in any degree depend on any individual or collective action they may take; their laws do not create justice, or the obligation to be just, but, on the contrary, are based on this well-recognized obligation, which they at least pretend to embody and execute. In other words, Moral Obligation is not only an objective and universal fact, but it is also a necessary fact.

4. Moral Obligation a Part of the Nature of Things.

If Moral Obligation is not only objective and universal, but also necessary, then its true grounds must be sought far deeper than in any voluntary or artificial arrangements among men. All such arrangements presuppose it, but cannot originate it. Moral Obligation, therefore, is not a result of society, but lies deep down in the very conditions which make society possible,—conditions which may or may not be understood, but which, in proportion as they are understood and complied with, render society what it ought to be. The perception by men of what Moral Obligation is and demands, as the necessary condition of all society that is rightly constituted, may be clear or obscure, obeyed or disobeyed; but Moral Obligation exists none the less from the very moment when two moral beings enter into social relationship, that is, from the very moment when society begins, even in its lowest and crudest forms. Back of all association lie the conditions which determine it; social union does but create relations in actuality which in potentiality existed ab æterno. In other words, the Moral Obligation which constitutes the groundwork of all society, that is, the coëxistence of moral beings in social relations, and which is the subject-matter of Ethics as one of the natural sciences, is simply a part of the ultimate Nature of Things. Deeper than that no plummet can sink.

5. The Nature of Things.

The Nature of Things, on which I have shown that Scientific Ethics are ultimately grounded, is the totality of the necessary and absolute conditions without which nothing could exist. Moral Obligation is a part of it, but by no means the whole of it. The real character of Scientific Ethics, and the profound import of the principle that Scientific Ethics are grounded ultimately on the Nature of Things, will be best brought out, if I refer to some of the different classes of ultimate facts covered by the phrase.

A. Necessary and Contingent Relations.

There are two classes of relations, equally objective but not equally universal. A necessary relation is one which could not be supposed to be otherwise without involving utter absurdity; that is, without violating the fundamental laws of thought. A contingent relation is one which could be supposed to be otherwise without any absurdity. For example: every pebble, whether large or small, has an outside and an inside. It cannot without contradiction be supposed to have only one of the two; Omnipotence itself cannot be supposed to be able to create a pebble which had an outside, but no inside; the word itself implies the corresponding word. So also there could not be a father without the present or past existence of a child; if the child did not exist or had not existed, the man could not be a father. These cases illustrate what is meant by a necessary relation; that is, one which could not possibly be other than it is. On the other hand, a pebble might be either on or under a particular plank; there would be no absurdity in supposing either case. The pebble must have an outside and an inside; but might be either on or under the plank. The relation, then, between the outside and the inside of the pebble is a necessary or irreversible one; while the relation between the pebble and the plank is a contingent or reversible one. The distinction turns on the ultimate laws of thought, which are irreversible, and which do but express the necessity of things; that is, if science is possible at all. Whatever contradicts these ultimate laws is impossible; whatever they absolutely demand is necessary. No science can exist at all, if these principles are false; but all would then be illusion and deceit. This alternative I do not consider; for I claim for Ethics no more than the other sciences claim for themselves.

B. Various Classes of Necessary Relations.

There are various classes of necessary relations, of which I will give a few examples, in order to explain what I mean by the Nature of Things:—

Metaphysical: All events occur in space and time. Sometimes people who would pass for philosophers talk of existing hereafter outside of space and time; but they use words absolutely without meaning.

Physical: A moving body passing in a straight line from one point to another must pass through all the intervening points. To suppose the contrary would be absurd; and what is absurd cannot be true in fact. Else science is impossible.

Mathematical: Every square can be divided by a diagonal into two equal triangles. If anybody doubts it, he can try the experiment.

Moral: Justice is a virtue; every just deed deserves the approbation of all moral beings. These propositions are exactly as necessary, objective, and universal, as any of the foregoing; they are, therefore, exactly as much the subject-matter of science.

C. Necessary Relations Conditions of Existence.

Now the totality of all these and other necessary relations is the Nature of Things; which sums up all the ultimate conditions of all real existence. Whatever exists at all must exist in compliance with these conditions; to suppose the contrary is to be irrational, that is, unscientific. For example, we may suppose a time before which no square had ever been described as an actual mathematical figure; and then the relation of equality between the two triangles made by its diagonal could not be said to exist, except as the blank condition which would determine the properties of every square that should ever be called into existence. The relation itself had as yet no actual existence; it only existed potentially, as the law by which the properties of every possible square were determined beforehand. The moment the first square was drawn, the relation referred to was exemplified, and the blank condition turned into an actual mathematical truth. That is, this necessary relation was one of the absolute conditions without complying with which no square could ever be made; all squares that ever shall be made hereafter must comply with it; there is no possibility of the contrary. It therefore constitutes part of the ultimate Nature of Things, independent of all will, uncreated, eternal, necessary, absolute. To suppose the contrary is to commit suicide as an intelligent being, and to pronounce all the science of the world a dream of delirious imagination.

D. Moral Obligation One of these Conditions.

If this is true of the relation between the two triangles made by the diagonal of the square, it is every whit as true of the relation between the first pair of moral beings that ever came into existence,—every whit as true of all the other moral beings that have hitherto, or may hereafter, come into existence. The relation of mutual Moral Obligation among all moral beings is just as objective, just as universal, just as necessary, as the relation between the double triangles of the square. The square might not have existed; the moral beings might not have existed; that is, it would not be absurd to suppose that. But it would be absurd to suppose a square whose two triangles should not be equal; and it would be just as absurd to suppose two moral beings in social relations without being under mutual moral obligation. There is, therefore, no rational escape from the conclusion that "Moral Obligation is an Objective Reality, and Scientific Ethics are Grounded on the Nature of Things."

II. MORAL INTUITION A SUBJECTIVE REALITY: SCIENTIFIC ETHICS AS GROUNDED ON HUMAN NATURE.

1. Analysis of the Moral Nature.

"Conscience" is a complex faculty, and needs to be carefully analyzed for the purposes of exact thought. It includes three chief elements, Moral Intuition, Moral Sentiment, and Moral Power.

A. Moral Intuition.

The word intuition is one of the best-abused words in the English language. Used to denote a supposed special faculty for authenticating the existence of God and the immortality of the soul, intuition is arrayed against science, and shows itself to be indeed thoroughly unscientific, being made to serve as a sort of shelter or break-water against the approach of investigation, and thus occupying in some forms of Theism the position held in Christianity by the principle of unreasoning authority. But while intuition so considered is a hindrance to knowledge, and a broken reed to lean on, there is a kind of intuition which is indispensable to science itself, constituting as it does the substance of every cognitive act. Although I have been especially careful to specify exactly in what sense I repudiate intuition, I have been widely misunderstood to repudiate it altogether; and it is probably true that the sense in which I accept it will not at all answer the demands of those who are anxious to vindicate intuition as a possible substitute for exact knowledge. Not to enter now into any general discussion of this subject, it will be sufficient for my purpose to define moral intuition, as the words are used in Scientific Ethics, as follows: Moral Intuition is the immediate perception of a definite, objective, and necessary Moral Obligation, as a Social Relation between Moral Beings. In other words still, it is the immediate recognition of a particular moral obligation, imposed upon moral beings by the Nature of Things just as soon as they enter into social relations. Moral Obligation is an objective fact necessarily involved in the fact of society among moral beings; and Moral Intuition is the immediate perception of this objective fact. Without the objective Moral Obligation, the subjective Moral Intuition could not possibly exist; for the Intuition is simply the reflection of the Obligation in consciousness. On the other hand, without the subjective Moral Intuition, the objective Moral Obligation could not possibly be known; for the knowledge of every objective fact implies necessarily the existence of an appropriate faculty for knowing it.

It is plain, therefore, that, since all moral relations are social relations of a special kind among moral beings, Scientific Ethics recognizes morality as inseparable from the fact of society, objective and necessary by the very Nature of Things; and unless at least two moral beings coëxisted under mutual relations, morality would be impossible. It is equally plain that Moral Obligation is also the necessary condition under which all moral beings enter into mutual relations; that there is nothing contingent about it; and that it could not be known, were there not a subjective faculty of Moral Intuition corresponding to the objective fact of Moral Obligation. To express it differently, Moral Obligation is the absolute condition of all society among moral beings; and Moral Intuition is the absolute condition of all knowledge of Moral Obligation.

At the same time, Moral Obligation does not depend for its objective existence on Moral Intuition. It exists objectively, whether known or not, provided that moral beings exist. The moral intuitions are of all degrees of clearness and strength, like the mathematical intuitions. This fact explains the varying moral judgments of different ages, climes, and conditions of men. Although no moral intuition can be prior, in point of time, to actually existing moral relations, and although every moral relation, so far as discerned at all, is discerned in the very first instance to be objective and necessary, it very frequently happens that moral relations are imperfectly known. In this as in other things,—for instance, in mathematics,—the knowledge of actual relations grows from less to more; but the increasing knowledge is simply the discovery of objective facts previously unperceived. Whoever reflects upon this subject long enough will see in this a complete explanation of the moral development of man. But he will also see in it the reason why the moral judgments of mankind become more and more alike in proportion as they become civilized.

B. Moral Sentiment.

Moral Sentiment depends for its development upon the development of Moral Intuition. It is a result rather than a cause of it, in accordance with the general law that, however disguised in their connection, the feelings adapt themselves to the perceptions in the long run, though feelings already developed usually advance or retard for a while the further development of the perceptions. There could be no consciousness or feeling of Moral Obligation, unless Moral Intuition had first taken cognizance of it. Moral relations may exist without being perceived; yet, when perceived, they awaken moral emotions. There is no nobler sentiment, and in all fine natures no stronger sentiment, than the sentiment of Duty,—the sublime consciousness of the Ought. The words Duty and Debt are etymologically the same, both being derived from the Latin debeo, "I owe;" debeo is de-habeo, "I have from" another, and therefore "I owe back" to him. Both Duty and Debt, therefore, express a social relation,—a relation of mutual moral obligation; for my debt to another is the duty I owe him, and my duty is the debt which he may justly claim from me as his right. So also the word Ought is the preterite tense of the verb owe; "I ought" was originally "I owed," as in the old version of the gospel by Tyndale—"There was a certain lender which ought him five hundred pence," that is, owed him. These facts show that the consciousness of Duty, of Debt, of the Ought, is fundamentally one and the same, as the feeling or sentiment which supervenes upon the recognition of the social, i. e. moral, relation one holds to another moral being. It is not enough, with Mr. Darwin, to rank the sentiment of the Ought as "merely a persistent instinct" [p. 88]; this instinct must be explained, and it can find no adequate explanation except in the facts that an objective moral obligation is perceived by a subjective moral intuition, and that this perception acts upon the emotional nature to call forth the feeling of an existing obligation. No one can feel an obligation before he sees it; but he may see it without feeling it very strongly, as is too often the case.

Connected with this primary sentiment of the Ought, this simple feeling of obligation as an actual duty or debt to others, are many allied sentiments which I cannot now stop to consider, yet which are of the greatest consequence, theoretically as well as practically. Such are the sentiments of approval or disapproval, which attach themselves to certain acts quite irrespective of the actor; the sentiments of self-respect and of remorse, which concern ourselves as actors; of admiration and indignation, which concern others as actors; and so forth. I can only call attention to the fact that all these various sentiments come into play as a result of Moral Intuition, whether it is clear or obscure, enlightened or mistaken; and that it is impossible, consequently, to build up any true science of morals on the merely derivative fact of feeling.

C. Moral Power.

Moral Power depends for its development upon the antecedent development both of Moral Intuition and Moral Sentiment. The objective moral or social relations must first be perceived and felt, before the duties and rights mutually existing among moral beings can be consummated in moral action. The true connection of Moral Power with Moral Intuition and Sentiment cannot be discussed without going into the interminable controversy touching freedom and fate; but I will spare you as well as myself from such an infliction, and pass on,—simply stating that the three elements into which conscience has been analyzed,—Intuition, Sentiment, Power,—exist in varying proportions in different individuals, and consequently give rise to all the boundless diversity of moral character which surrounds us.

2. Primary Laws of Scientific Ethics.

Scientific Ethics has thus been shown to be grounded on the universal Nature of Things, so far as objective Moral Obligation is concerned; and on the Nature of Man, so far as subjective Moral Intuition is concerned. It treats of the moral relations existing among moral beings, which are all, in the last analysis, of a social character; and its practical task, therefore, is the Determination of Rights and Duties in a State of Society among Moral Beings. All rights may be considered also as duties, and all duties also as rights; but the distinction between them is necessary, on account of the fact that each individual stands in definite relations to all other individuals, singly and collectively. All primary rights are individual, as against other individuals; all primary duties are social, as towards other individuals.

A. Primary Rights.

The primary rights of the individual are three: the right to Existence, under the necessary conditions of society; the right to Freedom, or to be uninterfered with, except so far as the necessary conditions of society require interference; and the right to Development, or to have whatever is essential to the completion of individuality, under the same conditions.

B. Primary Duties.

The primary duties are also three, being merely the primary rights of the individual differently viewed: the duty of respecting the lives of all other individuals, the duty of protecting the freedom of all other individuals, and the duty of promoting the development of all other individuals.

When Jesus laid down the Golden Rule as—"Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you," he stated substantially the above doctrine of rights and duties, as laid down by Scientific Ethics. But he referred the determination of rights and duties to the mere wish, or preference, or liking, of the individual, which is a very uncertain criterion: "Do unto others as ye would [that is, as ye would like] that others should do unto you." The scientific translation of the Golden Rule into the doctrine of Primary Rights and Duties supplies the lack of a definite objective principle, or idea; which is an important ethical advance.

The limitations of rights and the modifications of duties, consequent upon the various complications of social relationships, cannot here be dwelt upon, but would form a very important portion of a fuller treatment of the subject.

3. Ultimate Objects of Scientific Ethics.

The ultimate objects or ideal aims proposed by Scientific Ethics are, first, the moral perfection of the individual by the highest possible culture of his moral nature, and, secondly, the moral perfection of society by the completest possible fulfilment of all rights and duties in an actual social state.

4. Fundamental Motives of Scientific Ethics.

The fundamental motives appealed to and fostered by Scientific Ethics are: first, reverence for the universal Nature of Things, as the ultimate ground of all moral obligation; secondly, reverence for Human Nature, as the subjective reflection of the Nature of Things; and, thirdly, reverence for the Social Humanity which ought to be the objective reflection of it. To phrase it a little differently, the supreme motives of Scientific Ethics are the Love of Truth, the Love of Virtue, the Love of Man.

III. MORAL OBLIGATION AND MORAL INTUITION: SCIENTIFIC ETHICS AS GROUNDED ON THEIR SYNTHESIS IN THE MORAL HISTORY OF MANKIND.

1. Moral Obligation a Part of the Environment.

Moral Obligation is, as I have tried to show, the supreme fact in the Nature of Things; that is, the potential moral relations which necessarily come into actual existence, whenever moral beings are brought into a state of society, constitute the highest order of relationships known to us. Being objective and universal, they form a part, and in a high sense the most important part, of that universal ENVIRONMENT which pours its constant, all-surrounding, and all-permeating influences upon slowly developing man. It is impossible to explain the fact that man has at last become a moral being, though evidently having had his origin in lower races devoid of all recognizable moral characteristics, without perceiving that, all things considered together, the action of the environment on him has been, on the whole, a moral one. This fact that the total influence of the universe on man has been to render him a moral being is of itself a sufficient proof that Moral Obligation is an objective fact of the Nature of Things, and has therefore impressed itself on man as a fact of his subjectivity. The whole tendency of modern science is to explain the facts of human development and experience by the iterated and reiterated impressions made on his plastic organization by the never-ceasing action of the environment; and I do but faithfully carry out the same line of thought by referring his moral development to the same cause. Unless Moral Obligation were part and parcel of the Nature of Things which has from his very origin been constantly impressing itself upon him, the fact that he is to-day a moral being, with moral obligations resulting necessarily from his social relations, would be an absolutely hopeless anomaly.

2. Moral Intuition the Reaction of Man to the Action of the Moral Environment.

Moral Intuition is, as I have also tried to show, the supreme fact of man's subjectivity. It must be regarded as a faculty developed in him by the constant action of the Moral Environment, that is, the sum-total of all the moral relations involved by the aboriginal necessity of things in the gradual evolution of human society. Although it seems impossible to account for the slow concentration or focalization of moral intelligence in man on any other hypothesis than that of a circumambient infinity of moral intelligence identical with the universal Energy whence his whole being is ultimately derived, it is nevertheless true that the process of evolution by which this concentration is effected must be a constant action and reaction between the Environment and the Organism. When the influence of necessary Moral Obligation, as an objective and universal reality acting incessantly on man's cognitive capacity, is taken into thoughtful consideration, it appears almost impossible to resist the conclusion that a faculty of Moral Intuition must be developed in him at last, in the same manner as the faculty of Mathematical Intuition has been developed. Each new perception of a moral relation adds to his stock of moral knowledge, and at the same time strengthens by exercise the perceptive faculty by which it has been acquired; the discovery of other moral relations previously unsuspected will follow as a natural consequence of this increase of perceptive or intuitive power. In this way it may be seen how the faculty of Moral Intuition itself is the result of the perpetual action on Man of his Moral Environment and his reaction to it.

3. The Natural History of Conscience.

By this unending action and reaction between man and his environment, the moral evolution of mankind can alone be explained. It supplies the data for the Natural History of Conscience, regarded as a thoroughly scientific tracing of the various steps by which the race has ascended from bestiality to a true humanity. Subsidiary to the evolution of Moral Intuition, yet accelerating it in various ways, the evolution of Moral Sentiment and Moral Power will be simultaneously explained. The consolidation of these elements into habit, the conversion of habit into what might be termed reflex moral action, and the transmission of reflex moral action as hereditary moral instinct, together with such moral phenomena as may properly be classed with the general facts covered by the laws of variation and natural selection, all showing how man has slowly risen to a larger moral life, will go to make up a Natural History of Conscience, which must indubitably constitute an essential part of Scientific Ethics. Little by little has moral knowledge been acquired, mixed as it still is with ignorance, errors, and blunders of all kinds; little by little has this knowledge developed moral sentiment and moral power, and become incorporated into human character, life, and society. But nevertheless evolution is a fact, and still continues; and it will soon be recognized, independently of all supposed supernaturalism, as the true explanation of the moral experience of mankind.

SUMMARY.

I have now sketched in the most condensed manner, almost with the baldness and dryness of a mere "Table of Contents," an outline of Scientific Ethics, under three general divisions. The first division shows that Moral Obligation is an objective reality, as part of the eternal and immutable Nature of Things on which Scientific Ethics are grounded; that all science is concerned with the objective and universal alone, and that Ethics, as the science of socio-moral relations, meet this requisition; and it also shows what the Nature of Things is. The second division shows that Moral Intuition is a subjective reality, corresponding to Moral Obligation as its necessary subjective correlate; that conscience is a complex faculty, consisting of the triple elements of intuition, sentiment, and power; that all rights are duties, and all duties rights; that the three primary rights of man are life, liberty, and development, and that his three primary duties correspond; that the ultimate objects of Scientific Ethics are the moral perfection of the individual and of society; and that its fundamental motives are love of truth, love of virtue, and love of man. The third division shows that Moral Obligation and Moral Intuition, combined as endless action and reaction between the mind and the Nature of Things, give the clew to the Moral History of Man, which is explained only by the law of evolution; that his moral sense is not a phenomenon of purely subjective origin, but has been developed out of the dim perceptions of pre-human races by a slow process of experience, consisting in the first place of impressions made upon the blank capacity of intuition by objective moral relations, and in the second place of vital reactions by which these impressions appeared in consciousness as actual intuitions,—precisely as impressions made on the senses appear in consciousness as sensations.

It must be added, however, that, while the mind originates no intuition except as it is directly affected by the truth of things, which is independent of it, yet the mere presence of the truth of things could no more create the capacity of intuition than the capacity of intuition could create the truth of things,—that it takes the correlation and constant interaction of the two, accepted as given facts, to explain moral phenomena. To go behind these facts, as such, Scientific Ethics must become Scientific Philosophy.

RELATION OF DARWIN'S THEORY TO SCIENTIFIC ETHICS.

Mr. Darwin's theory of conscience as a highly complex faculty developed out of the social instincts, and manifesting itself increasingly in proportion to the social advancement of the race, will be seen at once to belong as an essential part, with some modifications, to Scientific Ethics. It finds morals substantially in social relations alone; it acknowledges the necessity of the development of the "intellectual powers" before conscience can be developed out of the social instincts, and thereby (though unconsciously) prepares the way for admitting that the intellectual perception of social relations—that is, moral intuition—must be developed, before the social instincts can give rise to the moral sense; and by placing the "test of morality" in the "general good of the community," it begins to transfer the basis of Ethics from the subjective to the objective, though this transference is not complete till the Nature of Things is recognized as the ultimate basis. But the most striking merit of Mr. Darwin's theory appears in the fact that it is the first truly scientific attempt to explain conscience "from the side of natural history;" and this fact will make the entire third division of Scientific Ethics merely an expansion of his theory, with a few necessary modifications. The exceeding ingenuity of his treatment of the subject, and the great insight he displays into the evolution of what I have called Moral Sentiment as distinguished from Moral Intuition, will render the required modifications rather an addition than a correction to his theory. For instance, his illustration of the bees throws great light on such a case as that of the ancient Spartans, who are said to have come to regard theft as a virtue in consequence of their peculiar social necessities; while it will be necessary to concede the objective immorality of the conception. The order of exposition in any science being the reverse of that of its development, Mr. Darwin has naturally begun with the third rather than with the first division of Scientific Ethics; but the great excellence of his work will be fully appreciated only by one who takes in the science of morals as a whole. Henceforth it will be impossible to teach Ethics in any scientific way without due acknowledgment of his genius; and one must smile when Miss Cobbe, in her beautiful essay on "Darwinism in Morals," is led to exclaim: "Let me say it at once. These doctrines appear to me simply the most dangerous which have ever been set forth since the days of Mandeville." Her fears are groundless; Truth is ever the dearest friend of Virtue.

THE TWO GREAT SCHOOLS OF MORALS.

Under various names, there have been two great schools of moral philosophy ever since the beginning of human thought. The one, called in most recent phraseology the experiential, utilitarian, or derivative school, refers all moral judgments to experiences of utility, regards them as all generalized from observations of the different effects of different actions upon human happiness, and reduces moral obligation in the last analysis to the purely subjective principle of the "inseparable association" of ideas which have been acquired or inherited. The other, called usually the intuitional or sentimental school, refers all moral judgments to à priori principles of intelligence, independent of all experience of objective realities, and thus reduces all moral obligation in the last analysis to the purely subjective principle of an inexplicable "constitution of the human mind." To the former school belongs John Stuart Mill; and Herbert Spencer gives in his adhesion to it in the following words: "I believe that the experiences of utility, organized and consolidated through all past generations of the human race, have been producing corresponding modifications, which, by continued transmission and accumulation, have become in us certain faculties of moral intuition—certain emotions responding to right and wrong conduct, which have an apparent basis in the individual experiences of utility." [Quoted by Mr. Darwin and Miss Cobbe.] Spencer here seemingly recognizes moral intuitions, yet reduces them to mere emotions, which are subjective affections and not objective perceptions. To the other or intuitional school belong Miss Cobbe and Mr. Lecky: the former maintaining that moral intuitions are "ultimate data of our mental constitution, ideas obtained by the à priori action of the normally developed mind" [Darwinism in Morals, and Other Essays, p. 16]; and the latter maintaining that "by the constitution of our nature the notion of right carries with it a feeling of obligation . . . . that we derive the first principles of our duties from intuition." [History of European Morals, vol. 1, p. 3.]

SCIENTIFIC ETHICS INCLUDE BOTH SCHOOLS.
